The late general election in the British Isles led to a vast expenditure of money one way or another. The London Chronicle, in the course of an article dealing with the subject says:—"A general election is an expensive luxury, though the outlay is met by a few individuals. If the cost of electing 670 members of parliament were borne entirely by the public, nearly a million of money would be required from the national purse every time it suited the plans of a prime minister to dissolve. It is true that a general election does not cost so much now as it did in the bad old days when votes were openly bought and sold. The general elections of 1768, for instance, cost £2,080,000, and when Sheridan was returned for Stafford two years before he made an entry of his expenses thus: '248 electors at five guineas each, £1,362.' Even these citizens valued themselves lightly, for the average cost of each vote given at the general election which followed was £19 15s. 3d. The corrupt practices act of 1883 changed all that by setting a strict limit to the expenses which a candidate might incur, the scale, varying according to the magnitude and conditions of the constituency. But even under these circumstances purses must be opened widely, so that the judgment of the nation may be declared. In the general election of 1892 there were 1307 candidates, and the official return showed an average outlay by each candidate of over £700. Three years later the 4,345,527 votes which were given cost 3s. 8½d. each. And in 1900, when only 3,519,345 voters took the trouble to go to the poll, the amount of money spent, according to the official returns, was £777,389, and the average cost per vote was 4s. 4d. Of course, even this large expenditure does not represent the whole of the outlay which a candidate must face. Usually he nurses the constituency for some time as a prospective candidate before the election actually begins, and that is a costly amusement. To all sorts of clubs, charities and institutions he is expected to contribute, and he must lay down a substantial sum for the maintenance of a good organization. It is impossible even to estimate the amount spent in this way; but probably it would not be an exaggeration to double the official return, and to put the cost of the last appeal to the country at a million and a half of money. This sum was paid by 1103 candidates. The distribution of the official half of the amount is very curious. The returning officers' charges form a very heavy item, amounting to £150,278. The ballot papers, boxes, dies, and stationery cost £15,544, and for 10,720 polling stations £24,540 was expended, while more than £54,000 was paid to polling clerks. The candidates themselves paid £148,245 to agents, £24,000 for committee rooms, and £41,000 in personal expenses; but by far the largest outlay was that for printing, advertising, stationery, and postage, for in this way over £274,000 was spent. Compared with this item, the allotment of £15,800 as the cost of public meetings is very trifling."

A Manila cable to the Japan Advertiser says: "Advices received by the State Department declare that the damage to the Panama Canal resulting from the earthquake which shook up the isthmus early in the week is much greater than at first represented. The embankments of the canal have caved in at many places, and it will take at least two months to clear away the wreckage and repair the damage done to supply depots and other buildings."

CHINA.

Saturday, February 17.

The Governor of the Amur region is said to have raised funds sufficient for constructing a railway from Tsitsihar to Aihen and Hulanching. He has memorialized the Throne for permission to set about the work and his project is said to have been warmly welcomed in Peking. If the Chinese roused themselves to anything like the fervour of railway enterprise that has been witnessed in Japan, all questions of recovering rights would soon disappear from the region of practical politics. And yet, when we come to look back, it was the leadership of Japanese officialdom that set the ball rolling in this country. The first railways constructed were paid for by the Treasury, and no little difficulty was experienced in inducing private people to subscribe capital for the Nippon Tetsudo. Without a substantial government guarantee the thing could never have been. We can recall the time when the 100 yen shares of that railway were quoted at 92 in the open market. The 50 yen shares now stand at 104.50 yen, although the guarantee money has ceased to be payable. If the Chinese Government put its financial shoulder to the wheel in that manner, China would soon be equipped with roads.

Monday, February 19.

The Nichi Nichi's correspondent in Peking telegraphs that at the conference now being held between representatives of Russia and China, Viceroy Tung Chao-yi, one of the Chinese commissioners, declared that Russians are engaging in mining enterprises in various portions of northern Manchuria without having first obtained permission from the Chinese Government. Such conduct was regarded by China as an abuse of the friendly relations existing between the two countries and a violation of the sovereignty of China. After presenting various copies of documents to the Viceroy, Mr. Pokotiloff said in reply that these papers showed that contracts with regard to mining had been concluded between the director of the Harbin Negotiations Bureau, representing the Chinese Government, and Russian officials. M. Pokotiloff further contended that under these contracts the Russians commenced mining in Kirin and the provinces along the Amur and that consequently the Russian Government had no responsibility and should not be blamed by the Chinese as the conduct of his nationals was not illegal. Viceroy Tung said that the Director of the Harbin Negotiations Bureau had made the contracts with the Russians without first obtaining any authority from the Central Government and for this he had been dismissed from his post. The Chinese Government was earnestly desirous of cancelling any contracts concluded illegally. The Viceroy regarded the mining contracts held by the Russians as null and void. The reply of the Russian commissioner was that the contracts had been made with the Chinese representative while he was in active service and his government could not now throw him over and disallow the rights he had granted. The discussion ended abruptly no conclusion being reached. The correspondent of the Nichi Nichi adds that the Director of the Harbin Negotiations Bureau received a large bribe from the Russians when he made these contracts; but stories of bribery and corruption seem inevitable when transactions such as these are retailed by the public.

Tuesday, February 20.

In connexion with the Russo-Chinese negotiations, a Peking telegram published by the Hochi says that the Russian envoy asked the Chinese commissioner for joint-mining concessions in Mongolia and for leave to construct a railway to Kulon. Viceroy Tung Chao-yi said that he must decline to accede to such a request as the present negotiations were simply for regulating matters arising out of the China-Japan treaty, consequently any new request by Russia could not be entertained. The Viceroy added that a similar request by Russia had been once before refused when it was tendered after the Boxer troubles.

In Changchou and Chapu, Fukien province, twelve men have been arrested charged with having instigated the recent riot. One was executed. In Ho-shan, Anhui province, disturbances have also taken place and a number of troops have been sent to the place.

The Jiji prints a telegram from Peking to the effect that Viceroy Tung Chao-yee and M. Pokotiloff, the commissioners in the special Russo-Chinese negotiations, have had four meetings but no definite conclusion has been arrived at yet.

Prince Ching will shortly leave for Mongolia to investigate administrative affairs there. The former report with regard to the proposed visit to Moscow seems to be baseless.

Wednesday, February 21.

Viceroy Tung Chao-yi, a Commissioner to attend the Russo-Chinese negotiations, left Peking on Feb. 19th for Tientsin where he intends to hold consultation with Viceroy Yuan in connexion with the conference.

The Jiji's Peking correspondent says that China's attitude with reference to the withdrawal of the guards of the Powers from North China is becoming more favourable. It is said that Germany has decided to withdraw her troops before the end of March, leaving only three hundred men in Peking, and that the other Powers will retire their guards in Peking and Tientsin within three months from now. But such reports have come frequently from Peking of late.

The Governor of Kiangsu has been released from service. The Hochi's Shanghai telegram says that his dismissal is in connection with the recent anti-foreign disturbances in the city. Mr. Chin Yelung has been ordered to succeed him in the post.

The construction of the bronze statue of the late Li Hung-chang having been completed in Shanghai, the unveiling ceremony was taken place in Peking on February 21st.

A Tokyo paper, the Yorozu, speaks of the proposed sale of Macao by Portugal. The Chinese Government, it is said, is trying to ascertain the terms of the sale through the Chinese Minister in Paris. It is added that the Portuguese Government has addressed inquiries to Great Britain and France as to its intention of selling the colony and that France is inclined to bid for its purchase.

There seems to have been a regular rush to obtain shares in the Canton-Hankow railway, subscriptions for which opened in Canton on February 6th. It is difficult to take the figures literally, for the reports tell that several tens of thousands made their way inside the doors of the Canton Chamber of Commerce. At any rate it was soon decided to take the buildings opposite the Chamber in order to get through with the work, and ease the crush. According to the graphic reports of the editor of the Canton Times, individuals of all classes are thronging into the Chamber of Commerce in order to get one or more shares. At one time a Buddhist nun was seen signing her name for a share. Then there followed a blind musician who had come to take up two shares. He could not write his name and the chairman wrote it for him. And so the scene was one of excitement, like unto the South Sea bubble in London—before it burst. It appears that already in Canton not less than $5,000,000 worth of shares have been subscribed for.

Thursday, February 22.

A report from Peking to the Asahi states that the Chinese and Russian Commissioners are engaged in submitting to each other their various contentions; the negotiations are consequently in a somewhat involved condition.

China demands the rescission of all mining concessions and insists upon re-occupying the districts in Northern Manchuria, West Aihun, and points along the Amur, Kulon, etc., which she alleges were illegally acquired by the Russians. Russia, on her part, requires concessions in connection with railway construction in Mongolia and in the Amur districts—though no special routes are indicated. The correspondent, however, indicates that Tsitsihar, Blagovestchensk, and Kiakchta will be connected. It is alleged that the Russian demands are designed to intimidate China and that this fact is fully recognized in Peking diplomatic circles.

The Waiwupu is stated to have received a telegram from the Governor-General of the Amur province stating that Russians are working the Trugafar and Hiraga gold mines and have taken up important positions near the Hakho and Huan-on-shan, and that they refuse to give up occupation of those places, although he had urged them to do so. He advises the Government to take steps for the conserving of their interests in the territory, and adds that there are as yet no signs of the withdrawal of the Russian armies.

The British Minister is reported to have asked the Waiwupu to open Nan-nien in Kwansih province for foreign trade. The purpose of the British Minister in asking this is reported to be that he desires to avert the establishment of preferential interests in these district by France, who has been working hard to obtain the concession.

A telegram to the Hochi says that in Chinchou, Honan province, an anti-foreign religious disturbance has occurred under the leadership of members of the Kolao-hui. A company of infantry was sent to the place by the local governor.

In connexion with the recent troubles in China—the anti-American mercantile agitation, the Mixed Court affair in Shanghai, the attacks on foreign missionaries, and on foreign churches, etc.—Mr. Uchida, Japanese Minister in Peking, has presented to the Waiwupu, under the instructions of his Government, a warning that the Chinese authorities should take precautionary steps with regard to riots and that they should allay the anti-foreign feelings of the people. The minister further said that if such feelings among the people are left uncontrolled serious trouble, similar perhaps to the Boxer affair, will be fostered.

The Tientsin Times says, according to the Kokumin's Peking correspondent, that Russia is endeavouring to acquire in China interests equivalent to those obtained by Japan. This is the only reason why the Russo-Chinese conference is still in difficulties. The negotiations will not be amicably settled unless Russia abandons her boastful attitude.

An official telegram has been received in Tokyo to the effect that the Japanese Buddhist temple of Hongwanji in Foochow was recently burned by a number of Chinese rioters.

Friday, February 23.

According to native papers, says a Peking correspondent of the Asahi, General Chang Ku, Governor-General of Ili, has been conducting negotiations with a Belgian syndicate with a view to a loan in order to construct a railway between Lanchow in Kansu and Ili via Urumutsi so as to be able to deal with any future emergency on the part of Russia. Incidentally, the enterprise became known to M. Pokotiloff, Russian Minister in Peking, who thereupon presented a protest to the Chinese Government. He said that there was no reason for the raising of a loan in a foreign country for the construction of a railway which has so close a connection with Russia unless by calling on the latter for the funds needed. As a result, the Chinese Government ordered the governor-general of Ili to stop the loan negotiations with the Belgians.

The same correspondent reports that the Chinese Commissioners in the Russo-Chinese negotiations have asked the Russians to cancel the timber-felling contract which was concluded between General Chan-su—who is a different person to the present Governor-General of Ili province. As is usual, the Russian Commissioners absolutely refused to give their consent, and further they asked the Chinese for a joint engagement—Russians and Chinese—in the timber-felling industry on the Amur. The correspondent adds that the proceedings were very vaguely conducted, one side simply making demands and the other refusing. No definite conclusion has yet been arrived at.

A Secretary of the Chinese Cabinet has presented a memorial to the Throne. Referring to the defences in the western and northern provinces which run with the Russian frontier, he advises the re-enforcement of the present garrisons. He further says that it is better for China to avail of the Japanese armies still in Manchuria, in order to maintain general order in those regions. Probably Japan will consent if the Chinese Government asks for a delay in the withdrawal of the troops.

British and Chinese engineers have commenced the survey of the route selected for the proposed railway between Burma and Yunnan. The work will be conducted by joint commissioners of both countries.

On Feb. 20th, the Japan Society at Shanghai entertained Rear-Admiral Taketomi and other officers of the South-China Squadron. On the 21st, at noon, the officer commanding the squadron entertained the leading Japanese residents on board his flag ship Chitose.

The gun-boat Uji arrived at Shanghai on Feb. 20th from Hankow. The Chitose left Shanghai on the 22nd for Amoy.

All the officials of the Puhoo district met at the Foreign Office in Shanghai on the 21st. Their business seems to have been in connection with the late anti foreign disturbances.

The Taotai of Shanghai has been appointed Governor of Peking.

Mr. Yokura, an official of the Military Administrative Office in Kwantung, left Yingkow on Feb. 20th for home.

A number of the Japanese ladies belonging to the Ladies' Patriotic Society held a bazaar on Feb. 20th at Yinkow in aid of various benevolent enterprises.

The condition of Lieut.-General Matsunaga, who is undergoing treatment at Tiehling, is still serious.

The remainder of the Yalu Army will leave Mukden on Feb. 24th for Dairen.

Major Kawasaki, of the Tiehling Military Administrative Office, died on Feb. 20th from apoplexy.

The N.-C. Daily News is informed that the two men who were concerned in the murder of the late Superintendent Kelly at Changsha, and were subsequently shot by Chinese troops, made their way to a neighbouring village and killed four or five Chinese out of pure wantonness before their careers were summarily stopped. The private letter from Hankow which states these facts, and which has been shown to our contemporary, also avers that the man who gave the name of Pericles Monotouri was making use of the name of a man who is still alive and who had no part whatever in this disgraceful affair.

Ex-Viceroy Hin Ying-kwai, on behalf of the Kwangtung gentry, has addressed another telegram to Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai, denouncing Viceroy Shum as "pertinacious and tyrannical," treating the laws with contempt, and embroiling the people. The whole province is "bubbling" with revolt, which encourages bandits and robbers. A rising of ten thousand angry people is possible, says the Hongkong Daily Press, and other provinces may be involved in such a calamity. "The foreign merchants on the Shameen have already requested their respective Governments to send gunboats and soldiers to protect them. The foreign ladies have already fled from Canton for safety. All Canton is shaking. Every day that Viceroy Shum is allowed to remain, the situation will grow worse." The message here went on to ask the powerful Viceroy to petition for the removal of Viceroy Shum.

The N.-C. Daily News has received the following from its Chungking correspondent, dated January 12th:—

"I have just got the North-China Herald of the 15th of December with the account of the Mixed Court trouble. I have made enquiries about Mrs. Li and have ascertained the following facts on reliable authority. From the native Shanghai papers one would think Mrs. Li was a lady of some importance, and this I gather is the idea that most foreigners in Shanghai have got. The late Mr. Li was a very small official of the 9th rank holding a small job in Chengtu as tsuiyuan. He had very little money, and what he left went to buy his coffin and help pay towards Mrs. Li's travelling expenses. The one hundred boxes of baggage you read about are her father-in-law's effects which he took the opportunity of sending down river preparatory to going bankrupt, which he did about the 4th of January, failing for Taels 19,000 in Chungking and Tls. 30,000 in Shanghai. The passport issued by the Taotai of Chungking, i.e., the Imp. Mar. Customs, was the ordinary document required by all travellers, whether Chinese or foreign, who travel by water between Ichang and Chungking, and in no way was a special document, and did not give particulars of her party, but simply stated the number of packages she had. It is presumed she had bought the five girls she took down with her, but her position, either financial or social, in no way warranted her having five slave girls for her own use, and no one here doubts for a minute they were taken down for sale either in Shanghai or Canton. Unfortunately, this traffic is only too common, and is carried on by most Chinese leaving Szechuan for the coast. Mrs. Li, on account of her father-in-law's failure, will not get much sympathy here. All this, of course, does not affect the question at issue but I send you these facts to make use of if you like. They show that the position of the woman was greatly exaggerated, and that, although she did not kidnap the girls, she was taking them down for sale."

In view of the rumours which have lately been circulated as to the situation in China, it may be noted that a correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News, who signs himself "Quiet," is disposed to consider that the current anxiety is largely the outcome of "funk" on the part of foreign residents. He writes as follows:—

"It seems to take an unusually long time for the nerves of foreigners in Shanghai to get into moderate equilibrium once more. Yet all are ready to admit that the affair of the 18th of December is not to be compared for a moment with the Boxer uprising. If we call the latter a destructive avalanche, the former might be called the falling of a few snowflakes. How then do we explain the continued feeling of anxiety, the agitation for better protection against mobs, etc., etc.? In the first place, some of the 'old hands' have been on a 'nervous stretch' ever since 1900 and should have gone home and stayed. Secondly, we have always had a sprinkling of foreigners in China who 'hate the Chinese,' 'don't believe a word the Chinese say,' 'haven't a friend among the 400,000,000 of Chinese!' etc. The 'sprinkling' has, I fear, become an overlying general crust.

"Then again, the proportion of foreigners who have no knowledge of the language and who are dependent on interpreters is daily increasing. These always scent danger at one or the other turn of the road and are not to be severely blamed. Finally, there are more women and children in the East than formerly, and men naturally feel a great burden of responsibility. Now, what I wish to say is, that so far as I can see—and I stand in pretty close communication with Chinese of several provinces—while there is a more general agitation all over the country than ever before, it is so unlike the agitation preceding the Boxer trouble that there is not the thousandth part of a probability that it will have a similar result. Not every breeze is the forerunner of a typhoon. I must not trespass on your valuable space to point out in how many of its essential features the present situation differs from that which existed previous to and during former troubles. This has been done in part by some of our well-informed correspondents, but in part only. To me it seems the points of difference are many and radical, and I deplore the too general assumption that the lives and property of foreigners are again in danger. Every enterprise in which we are interested suffers more or less by our over-nervousness."

The N.-C. Daily News translates from the Shenpao a report to the effect that the conference between representatives of the British and Chinese Governments with reference to the rendition of Wei-hai-wei by Great Britain to China is about to be held, and that the British Government has shown itself favourable to the demand of China that Wei-hai-wei be returned to her without delay.

The Nanfengpao says that H.E. Chang Yintang, Special Chinese Commissioner for negotiating the Tibetan Treaty, has wired to the Waiwupu stating that since the resumption of treaty negotiations, the specially appointed British Commissioner has shown a quite conciliatory attitude, but the Indian Viceroy demands that Great Britain shall have the right to all mining and railway privileges in Tibet, and that not only shall other nations be debarred from sharing these privileges, but China herself must consult Great Britain before participating therein; and that the negotiations will not be concluded on any other basis. The Waiwupu is requested to wire instructions anent the matter, but it has not done so yet.

AT HOME AT THE AMERICAN LEGATION.

A very enjoyable affair took place at the American Legation on Thursday where an At Home was given by Mr. and Mrs. Huntington Wilson in honour primarily of the anniversary of George Washington's Birthday. Between 400 and 450 people accepted the invitation of the American Charge d'Affaires and his charming wife. Prince Arthur with his suite attended about 4 p.m. The decorations were specially noteworthy, the most observable, perhaps, being a semblance of a cherry tree, with large twigs growing from it, and a representation of a hatchet, which attracted much attention from the visitors. One of the features of the day were some fine musical selections by the Rev. J. Stick, of Sendai. Refreshments were set out in lavish style, various young ladies, including the two daughters of Consul-General Miller, doing courteous service to the guests. The occasion was most enjoyable to all who were privileged to take part in it and Washington's Birthday may be said to have been fittingly observed in Tokyo.

MR. H. B. HULBERT.

Mr. H. B. Hulbert—who appears to have been drafted into the ranks of “me professor too.”—has been saying some very interesting things, according to an American paper which the Japan Daily Advertiser copies. He is thus quoted:—

I would not give thirty-five cents on the dollar for American interest in Korea if the Japanese secure jurisdiction over American citizens here.

At present the United States has in Korea extra-territorial rights. American citizens are tried by the American consul, not in Korean courts. Now the Japanese, having assumed a protectorate over Korea, are seeking the abolishment of the extra-territorial rights of this country, and the Japanese newspapers, at the present time, are talking about getting jurisdiction over Americans. It would be the worst that could happen.

Long before the war with Russia, the Japs started in this country a campaign of education. They succeeded in hypnotizing the American public. They made Americans believe that the Japs were about everything that was right and proper, and succeeded, at the same time in getting a pretty low idea of Korea and Koreans fixed in the American mind. As a matter of fact, there is not a hand's breadth of difference between Koreans and Japs. Dress them in the same clothes and you couldn't tell them apart. Most Koreans look upon the Japanese as barbarians.

Since the Japs have overrun Korea they have brought into the country a low class of immigrants. They have been brutal and tyrannical, seizing property right and left, and have gotten possession of all the resources and assets of the Korean Government. I speak from experience, because I have in my possession now no less than 50,000 deeds for as many parcels of land. The owners of these plots, many of them widows, came to me and asked me to buy their land at one cent a plot rather than it should go to the Japanese. My name to day is on hundreds of Korean houses. If I hadn't done that—of course I will never hold the land—the Japs would have confiscated the lands and driven off the Korean owners.

The United States had no right to take the word of the Japanese that the Koreans were willing to accept Japan's protectorate. The emperor of Korea cabled me that the treaty by which the protectorate was established was obtained from him “knife at throat.” The Japs said at first that Korean independence should be preserved. They violated their word, given to the whole world.

The Emperor of Korea has well chosen his advocate, if indeed Mr. H. B. Hulbert be of his Majesty's choice. An advocate who, unhampered by all scruples and undisturbed by old-fashioned reverence for truth, talks down to the level of his audience's credulity, has a certain advantage over conscientious opponents.

Mr. H. B. Hulbert courageously reckons that ninety-nine out of every hundred American citizens to whom he addresses himself are entirely ignorant of the fact that all their fellow-nationals in Japan are under Japanese jurisdiction and have been under it for nearly seven years without suffering the sixty-five per cent. losses he predicts should they come under the same jurisdiction in Korea. He appeals to the old prejudice against Oriental jurisdiction and since we must assume him not to have lived in the East all these years with closed eyes, it is necessary to credit him with full knowledge of the deception he thus attempts to practise on his fellow-countrymen. Perhaps he also reckoned that his words would not come under any eye in Japan, for on no other hypothesis can we imagine him uttering such a flagrant falsehood as that the Japanese are seeking the abolition of the extra-territorial rights of America in Korea and that the Japanese newspapers are talking about getting jurisdiction over Americans. If he does not know these allegations to be absolutely untrue, his ignorance is phenomenal. But indeed to discuss his utterances seriously is like breaking a fly upon a wheel. Pity is the proper sentiment with which to regard him. Evidently he has been rendered desperate by failure, and since he can not attract public attention by appeals to fact, he has recourse in his desperation to the methods of Mendez Pinto and Munchausen. The story about the fifty thousand title-deeds now in his possession and the hundreds of Korean door plates inscribed with the name of the tutelary deity, “Homer B. Hulbert” is quite worthy of the Russo-German romanticist. Only one feat remains to be achieved by Mr. H. B. Hulbert if his ambition soars to cap and bell notoriety. He should write a treatise denouncing Oriental dishonesty and pointing to the wreck that his own principles have suffered from residence in Seoul.

THE INDUSTRIAL AWAKING OF BRITAIN.

Figures which we published on the authority of Reuter at the beginning of January spoke of the business revival which had set in throughout Great Britain. Papers now reaching the Far East by mail bring some interesting comments on the outlook. The chief satisfaction to be derived from the return of increased exports is, says Engineering, the light they throw upon the industrial position of Britain in the markets of the world. The increase is largely attributable to the marked improvement in manufacturing methods and administration during recent years; and we are thus prepared for that coming great international trade competition which will be waged in the development of China and other Eastern countries, whither much of our increasing volume of exports have been shipped during the past two years. In many cases there has been a complete transformation in equipment and organisation of our works. The electric system of driving has been almost universally installed, new modern machine-tools have taken the place of the old venerated tools handed down from past generations, and the introduction of high-speed tool-steel has also further increased production. From many works we have information, for instance, of the rate of cutting being increased from 50 per cent. to almost 100 per cent. In some cases, too, this result has been achieved by a simple alteration of machines. Forged steel machine-cut teeth have been substituted for the ordinary cast-iron gearing, new headstocks have been substituted in old lathes, or new bed-plates have taken the place of weaker ones in the tools. In this respect the substantial character of British design has proved itself superior, and America and other nations are now adopting our scantlings. At the same time the management and, very frequently now, the workmen are, continues Engineering, alert to ensure that the machines are well fed with work. Indeed, an increasing number of factories are now realising the importance of an official whose sole business it is to see that every machine-tool is working at its maximum output, while at the same time the sequence of the work is arranged with more regard to progress in the erection of the completed manufacture. This “feed and speed man” has very pronouncedly increased the rate of production. The influence of the bonus and other systems of remuneration of labour, in direct ratio to work done, has had its effect, not, perhaps, because of the greater physical effort exerted by the workman, but because his whole mental faculty is exercised in the direction of greater foresight, to ensure that there will be no unavoidable waste of time owing to work not being at hand to keep the machine going, or to inefficient tools.

Many other directions might be indicated whereby the cost of production has been decreased capital charges, while at the same time the effort of the employer is continuously directed, not only to stimulate enterprise but to improve methods; but these may suffice to enforce the point that the investment of capital in industries is a vital element in the problem of international competition.

From the Economist we cut the following:—The secretary of the London Bankers' Clearing House has published the totals of the clearings for 1905, the figures again establishing a series of records for the year, for a month, and a day. Not only, however, is the total for the year the largest ever recorded, but the increase as compared with the previous year is greater than the difference between any two previous years. The clearings amount to the enormous total of £12,287,935,000, which compares with £10,564,197,000 for 1904, and thus shows an increase of £1,723,738,000, equal to 16.3 per cent. The following is a statement of the total clearings for the past ten years:

1904 .....	10,564,197,000
1903 .....	10,119,825,000
1902 .....	10,028,742,000
1901 .....	9,561,069,000
1900 .....	8,960,170,000
1899 .....	9,150,269,000
1898 .....	8,097,291,000
1897 .....	7,491,281,000
1896 .....	7,574,853,000

GERMAN INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.

The year 1905 was a record one for industrial progress in Germany, judging by the confidence with which the public has invested its money in industrial undertakings. Data gleaned from the Frankfurter Zeitung shows that the total amount of new capital subscribed to industrial companies in Germany for the past five years has been as follows (reckoning in millions of marks): 1901, 103; 1902, 94; 1903, 195; 1904, 267; 1905, 492. The following list shows the chief companies which have been thus supported, together with the amount of support they have received, which trade competitors may take as an indication of German public opinion as to the directions in which the industries of the future may be pushed with the greatest advantage:—

Companies.	Object.	Capital subscribed. (Mil. of marks.)
Rheinische Metallwaren .....	Hardware mfg. ....	3

Of course such a table as the above cannot supply any absolutely conclusive argument, but it certainly does indicate some of the chief directions in which German trade has advanced during 1905, the importance of coal and oil fuel, iron and steel manufactures, cheap transport (canals) at home, and, above all, electrical enterprise, both at home and abroad, being justly conspicuous.

MR. T. MILLARD.

A telegram to the Jiji Shimpō says that Mr. T. Millar has contributed to Scribner's Magazine an article in which he says that the movement in China to exclude American goods has been incited by the Japanese; that a majority of the Chinese vernacular journals are controlled by Japanese and are employed for the purposes of this campaign; that at the time of the inauguration of the movement (20th July, 1905) the Eastern Times, which is published in Shanghai in the name of a Japanese subject, made itself conspicuous for the encouragement it rendered; and that all the Japanese in the interior of China and nearly all the Chinese students educated in Japan are employed actively in the same cause. It is added that this article has attracted much attention in the United States. Commenting on the telegram, the Jiji says that Mr. T. Millar is known in the Far East as a newspaper correspondent of markedly Russo-phil proclivities; that during the war he published several statements injurious to Japan's credit, and that he apparently entertained the intention of discrediting her as much as possible. What surprises us (Japan Mail) is that such allegations should be thought worthy of notice in the United States. They bear the impress of exaggeration—to use no stronger term—on their face. For how can Mr. T. Millar undertake to advance even one of his sweeping propositions with any pretence of truth? How can he possibly be in a position to speak about the control of a majority of China's vernacular journals and the source from which they draw their inspiration? How can he possibly know whether the Japanese have or have not incited this movement? How can he possibly arrogate ability to describe the doings of all the Japanese residing in China and of nearly all the Chinese students who have studied in Japan? It is obviously beyond the reach of any man's intelligence to speak positively of such things, especially a man situated as is Mr. T. Millar who possesses no distinguishing title to be classed as an authority on Far-Eastern affairs. Without any particular knowledge of the subjects he discusses, any one can at once detect his reckless attitude towards the truth and his disposition to substitute journalistic darning for sober research. Men of the Millar and Hulbert type should constitute a striking object lesson in the eyes of the critics who set up to be analysts of Oriental duplicity.

RUSSIA'S DEMANDS.

There is a new version of Russia's demands, and this time M. Pokotiloff is represented as having received explicit instructions from St. Petersburg. He asks for four things:—

- 1.—Permission to build branch-lines in the Amur region.
- 2.—Permission to build a line from Kulong to Kialto and thence to Changkiakow.
- 3.—Permission to build a line from Shinkiang to Tli.
- 4.—A guarantee that there shall be no change made in the mining privileges already accorded to Russians in the Kirin and Amur regions.

The second of these demands is obviously the most important. Did China grant such a concession she would place Russia almost within cannon range of Peking, and the setback which the great Northern Power received when it had to surrender the Changchun-Liaotung road would be fully compensated. But can any reliance be placed on this version of the demands? A short time ago Peking correspondents undertook to set forth Russia's conditions in full detail and now apparently the list is discredited. Further, if Russia had emerged victorious from the recent war she could scarcely have asked for more extensive railway privileges. And finally, being fully aware of the temper of the Chinese nation at present, is it conceivable that Russia would deliberately formulate such proposals, unless indeed she desires to create fresh trouble, which is scarcely likely. It will be better to regard these various versions of "demands" with much incredulity.

There are other questions between the two Powers. Thus China is seeking to recover the customs revenue collected by the Russians during their occupation of Newchang, and as the Russian Government is said to have admitted that the money is lying in the Russo-Chinese Bank, there seems to be tacit acquiescence in China's claim. Further, the Governor of Kirin sends in a heavy bill on account of damages suffered by the inhabitants at the hands of the Russian soldiery. Possibly Russia's railway proposals are merely intended to be make-weights.

THE BRITISH LABOUR PARTY.

The phenomenal success of the Labour candidates in the recent general elections in the British Isles has given pause to many politicians. The older generation view the rise of this party as a sinister portent. As the astute London correspondent of the New York Tribune points out, "Liberalism has escaped the dangers of a Home-rule alliance by aiding and abetting the trade unionists. Organized labour being determined to secure an alteration in the law of combination, it has financed a successful campaign through the federated trade unions. Miners and railway servants have been assessed a shilling apiece, and more than a million of other trade unionists a penny each. The labour representation committee, organized by Keir Hardie, brought fifty candidates into the field with the understanding that those elected shall receive a salary of £200 each. With 2,000,000 trade unionists backing up with their pennies and shillings, 56 workingmen were elected. Titled unionists, wealthy landholders, prosperous manufacturers and Parliamentary veterans have been beaten by workingmen. The labour vote has increased enormously, and a compact fourth party has been formed in Parliament, with a natural affiliation with the Irish Nationalists. It is little less than a social revolution, and must have momentous consequences. While the Tories have been playing with the Home-rule bogey and the Liberals with the Chinese slavery bogey, trade unionism has triumphed and working England has found out how to make a Parliament truly democratic. The overwhelming victory for free trade without doubt has been won through the apathy and demoralization of Toryism, but it is even a greater one for organized labour. The Prime Minister heads an unmanageable coalition, but will apparently be protected against immediate dissension. Since the Liberals now have, and will probably continue to hold, a clear majority over the Conservatives, Nationalists and labour combined, he ought not to find it difficult to face Parliament with amendments to the education act and a revised law of combination. Conservative England will, however, be frightened, and with cause, for while no candidate in the more rampant Socialist group was elected, organized labour is likely to be strongly influenced by Keir Hardie's leadership, and another election will find the number of labour candidates trebled."

Since these words were written a slight rift has appeared in the Labour lute, Mr. Cremer issuing a circular in which he declares that he and his followers have no sympathy with the aims of the section led by Mr. Hardie, while the latter has declared that he mistrusts Mr. John Burns, the President of the Local Government Board, and, until his appointment the idol of the workingmen. The Chinese labour question, too, seems likely to rend the party in twain, as indeed it may dissipate some of the forces of the Ministry's direct supporters. Altogether the outlook from a Conservative point of view is not so hopeless as it seemed on the morrow of their disastrous rout at the polls.

THE MEAT ENTERPRISE IN KOBE.

The Kobe Meat Club, though compelled to encounter several untoward incidents during the past year, seem from the report of the Committee to have been fairly successful in their fight against the local monopolists. It may be recollected that the report for the first three months of the Club's working was on the whole very satisfactory; that for the full year is hardly so good, there being a debit balance of yen 1,011.56 which, however, is not serious when distributed among the members. Doubtless the results of the Kobe experiment will not be without interest to readers in other parts of Japan. The Committee say that after making the interim report:—

The Club met with a loss in the shape of two shipments of mutton from Shanghai (representing about yen 500), which arrived bad and consequently had to be destroyed; subsequently on account of being shut down upon by the wholesale dealers, the Committee were obliged to get beef from Shinonoseki. This also entailed a loss, which the high prices ruling throughout the Summer made it impossible to recoup. During this time other losses were made, by reason of the impossibility of keeping meat for any length of time in the hot weather. Your Committee were also unfortunate in losing a number of live sheep on the voyage from Shanghai, in one instance actually losing five out of a shipment of twelve. Recently prices have declined somewhat, and no doubt some lost ground has been made up in the months of November and December. Taken altogether, the Club passed through a rather trying time during the summer months, but there is no reason, with prices which are sure to go down still further, that the next year should not be a more successful one; at the worst the loss amounts to less than yen 5 per Member.

Australian Meat.—Your Committee made an experiment in this direction before prices in Japan began to fall, with the result that the meat was found to be of excellent quality, and the beef at the time laid down with cold storage charges at exactly the same price as that ruling for the Japanese article, while the mutton and lamb were somewhat cheaper than the same articles imported from Shanghai, and no risk of loss in that direction was incurred. There is, however, the drawback with regard to Australian beef—the animals being much larger it is impossible to cut them up so as to suit the needs of the Community, who have been used to the small joints cut from Japanese beasts, in many instances less than half the size. At the prices now ruling Australian beef cannot, independently of the cost of cold storage, be laid down so as to compete with the native article; mutton and lamb are, however, still available at favourable rates.

The Club have decided to entrust their business for the future to Mr. H. Julien, provision merchant, who guarantees to supply them for one year at lower prices than they are now paying.

At the annual meeting of the Kobe Golf Club on Tuesday last Dr. Thornicroft was re-elected President by acclamation, and the ballot for the Committee resulted in the election of Messrs. H. E. Daunt, A. H. Groom, G. Dell Clarke, E. H. Gill, A. W. Crombie, and J. D. Thomson.

KOREA.

Korean politics seem to be yet unsettled. At 11 p.m. on Feb. 16th, Li Kong-thaik, Minister for War was set upon by two men, armed with swords, who inflicted upon him severe injuries, chiefly about the head, neck and shoulders. Tokyo press correspondence says that the Minister had not long retired to bed when the assailants broke into his chamber. When surprised in their design they escaped from the place by jumping over the fence. The attack is said to have had a political motive. The Minister was at once removed to the Seoul Hospital, where he lies in a serious condition. Those who attacked him are still at large.

Previous to this matter, on the same evening, suspicious characters are said to have appeared at the house of the Minister's brother, Li Kong-kong, and the notion seems to be that he should be inveigled forth and share his brother's fate. The house of a younger brother of the Minister, Li Kong-sheong, was attacked the same night by rioters who threw stones and other missiles.

The politicians attached to the Il Chinghoi have decided to establish schools at several important places of the Empire with the view of encouraging education on the lines of western civilized countries.

A small riot seems to have been attempted at Chyol-la, where a number of persons tried to create a disturbance. Twelve Japanese police constables proceeded thither on Feb. 15th and arrested three of the ringleaders and captured seventeen rifles and 422 bamboo lances.

The condition of Li Kong-thaik, Minister for War, who was assaulted on Feb. 15th by two ruffians, is reported to be serious. The culprits are still at large.

The appointment of the officials to take charge of the wedding ceremonies of the Crown Prince is announced.

Two Japanese were attacked on Feb. 15th by a number of Korean villagers at Kyosan not far from Seoul. The Japanese, it is said, were hunting in the locality. One of them made his escape with difficulty to the capital but the other is missing.

Mr. Chin Sonkuin, a former councillor of the Cabinet, was arrested on the morning of Feb. 19th by Japanese gendarmes. He is under suspicion of having been one of the instigators in the recent troubles in Korea.

Two bodies of Russians stationed near Possiet Bay advanced southward on Feb. 12th crossing the Tumengang. Their purpose was apparently to acquire fowls, pork, and other food stuffs. The Japanese guards from the Hoi-Ryong district met them. Negotiations were conducted between the representatives of the parties, after which the Russians returned to their former position.

Among recent reports in connexion with the arrest of Mr. Chin Sonkuen, formerly Councillor of the Cabinet, there is a telegram published by the Asahi to the effect that he was one of the leaders of those who opposed the Convention between Japan and Korea and instigated the public against the Japanese.

Since the attack on Mr. Li Kong-thaik, Minister for War, the Japanese police have prohibited passenger traffic through the streets of Seoul after 11 p.m. It is reported that apprehensions are entertained as to the occurrence of similar cases.

Seven men have been arrested in connexion with the recent attack upon the Minister for War. The Kokumin's Seoul correspondent says that a politician of some note who had a portfolio in the Korean Cabinet participated in the attempted assassination.

The Asahi has a telegram to the effect that Mr. U. Huanchi (formerly Chief of Police), and his wife, with several other persons have been arrested by Japanese gendarmes on suspicion of having participated in the attempt upon the Minister for War. No person directly involved, however, has yet been discovered.

The Korean printers in Seoul employed by the Japanese newspapers Taihan and Chuo have struck and as a result the publication of these papers is interrupted. It is said that the men were instigated by a British subject.

The Korean Government has paid yen 3,232, through the Residency-General to the families of three persons who were killed in September 1904 by Koreans. It may be remembered that at this time the disaffected bands in the district of Shikow attacked the rural government office. In the fracas that ensued three Japanese were killed and two were injured, the Japanese Consul thereupon lodging a claim with the Korean Government for damages on behalf of the survivors. After tedious negotiations the Koreans consented to pay the funeral expenses of the deceased.

THE LOCAL GOVERNORS.

The various Governors of prefectures and cities began their meetings in Tokyo in the afternoon of Feb. 19th, assembling in the official residence of the Minister President, Marquis Saionji. All the Ministers of State were present with the exception of the Minister for Justice. In the course of an address to the assembled officials, Marquis Saionji pointed out to them that they were expected to devote special attention to the matter of floating new domestic loans on which subject the Cabinet were desirous of ascertaining their views. Instructions would be given by the Cabinet with regard to post-bellum administration and they looked to the local officials to assist them in carrying out their measures. It was only by the co-operation of the people with the Government that the effects of the victories achieved during the war could be realised. Mr. Hara, Minister for Home Affairs, also addressed the Governors and promised to give them further instructions as to their duties at the meeting to be held at the official residence of the Minister for the Treasury, which takes place to-day. The local officials present were afterwards entertained by the Minister President.

On Feb. 20th, the local Governors throughout the Empire held a meeting at the official residence of the Minister for Finance. Marquis Saionji, Premier; Mr. Hara, Minister for Home Affairs; Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce; Mr. K. Takahashi, Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, etc., were present. Mr. Y. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, made a lengthy speech in which he said that in connexion with the late extraordinary affair the Treasury paid out yen 1,445,000,000 in round numbers, and further, yen 457,000,000 was estimated to be needed in regard to the same matter. In the latter amount, the Government intends to appropriate yen 88,000,000, which is the remainder of the recent foreign domestic loan, as well as yen 7,000,000, which is the surplus of the Budget of the previous year. There was thus yen 362,000,000 to be raised by means of a loan. The Minister further went into post-bellum financial and administrative affairs, after which he asked the Governors to encourage the public to practice frugality and thrift. Marquis Saionji briefly spoke asking them to use their best endeavours towards accomplishing the issue of the sixth (new) exchequer bonds. At noon, the Governors were entertained by the Minister for Finance.

The meetings of the local Governors were resumed on Feb. 21st at the Home Department. Mr. Hara, Minister for Home Affairs, and other high officials of the Department were present. The Minister delivered a lengthy address. After referring to post-bellum finance, he went on to speak of the Government's intention of revising the laws with reference to city, town, and village organizations and of abolishing gun-sei, or rural district divisions. He added that the Government will probably submit in the present session of the Diet bills embodying the foregoing matters and stated that by administrative re-organization, it was hoped to cut down several million yen in yearly expenditure. He asked the Governors to make efforts towards developing the agricultural and industrial banks in their prefectures. In conclusion he said that another meeting will be held in April.

The meeting then closed. A farewell dinner was given by Mr. Hara in the evening at his official residence. The various Governors left Tokyo on Feb. 22nd for their posts.

THE AMERICAN NAVY.

This year the United States Navy not only makes its greatest gain in ships, it also adds to its fighting strength some of the most efficient, the fastest and the best equipped warships ever floated. Before the year is out seven big battle-ships, four armoured cruisers and two protected cruisers will be added to the United States Navy, if the present rate of construction is maintained. This will be the greatest increase in any one year of the history of the American navy, and it will advance materially the rank of the United States as a naval power. All the new vessels represent a high type and all that is modern in naval architecture. The battleships to be added within the year are the Virginia, Nebraska, Georgia, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Connecticut and Louisiana. The two last named have a tonnage of 16,000 each, while the other five have a tonnage of 14,948 each. The four armoured cruisers are the California and South Dakota, of 13,680 tons each, and the Tennessee and Washington of 14,500 each, while the protected cruisers are the St. Louis and Milwaukee, of 9,700 tons each. For the present at least the Virginia holds the battleship record of 19.01 knots, made during a four-hour run in the open sea. This shows her to be not only the speediest United States battleship afloat, but as fast as any ship of her class in any navy. When the Louisiana the other day easily exceeded her required speed, making 18.924 knots, the performance was hailed as a remarkable achievement, but the Virginia's record was never in serious danger, and is not likely to be exceeded by the Idaho, the last battleship to be launched, whose speed requirement is only 17 knots. In other respects, however, the Idaho, though smaller, will be a more up-to-date ship than some of her consorts. She is even better equipped than the Mississippi, which was launched in September. Electricity is used aboard the Idaho to a greater extent than ever before attempted on a warship. Her watertight bulkhead doors of the "long-arm" system are closed by electricity from the pilot house, thus giving assurance that the ship will be rendered unsinkable in case of emergency at sea. In this respect the latest American warships, over 30 in all, have an immense advantage over any other nation's navy. For the machinery to be operated by electricity, the wires pass through indestructible steel tubes, with separate connections at every gun. The purpose of this equipment is to make it impossible for a foe to disable the machinery, as was the case in the naval battles between Russia and Japan, when the machinery of nearly every Russian ship was shot to pieces by the expert Japanese gunners, disabling the fighting force, but otherwise leaving the ships unharmed and therefore valuable prizes.

EVOLUTION OF THE HORSE.

While scientists in England are doubtful of ever being able to definitely trace the ancestry of the horse back to its primeval beginnings, by means of fossil remains, American investigators are sanguine that the chain of equine evolution is complete, and that no links now remain to be dug up from the older deposits of the earth's surface. After years of search, and just when all hope of success had been abandoned, we read in a scientific magazine, the American Museum of Natural History, New York, has been rewarded by the discovery of remains of the "mountain horse," Orohippus. This discovery, if it will really bear the light of scientific investigation, will positively fill in the last gap in the record which science has long endeavoured to make perfect. The museum began its explorations in 1901 under the direction of Professor Henry F. Osborn, curator of the department of vertebrate paleontology, with a trip to the Big Horn basin of Northern Wyoming. The expenses were defrayed from a fund contributed by the late Mr. William C. Whitney. At his death these special explorations had to cease. The hunt for fossil horses is now carried on in conjunction with that for other fossil animals, until some equally public-spirited horse lover comes forward to continue it distinctively. The locality around Fort Bridger, Wyoming, was carefully searched for fossils, but particularly for the "mountain horse," fragments of which had been found and named by Professor Marsh in 1872. Parties sent out by the American Museum visited this region in 1893 and 1895, and from 1903 to 1905, but in spite of the most indefatigable efforts the Orohippus eluded the searchers. It had begun to look as though the attempt to locate his skeleton would have to be given up as hopeless, when on the very last day of the final expedition of 1905, just when the party was about to return, the long looked for remains were unearthed. These consisted of the skull, backbone, limbs and other parts of the skeleton of the very stage wanted. It will be some time before the museum will have ready its exhibit, showing every stage of horse evolution, beginning when the ancestor of the horse of to-day was about the size of an Irish terrier. The museum has already classified the fossils of the horse previously found in various localities in the western part of the United States, and will thus be able now to place before the public a complete ocular record of equine evolution from the early days of the Eocene period, estimated at 3,000,000 years ago, down to the present time. The museum's latest discovery, it will be seen, is of the greatest importance, not only because it will make the records more complete, but also because it may lead to the verification of the theory that the horse originated in America and not in northern Africa as some scientists hold. Professor Osborn will make a thorough examination of these remains, and his conclusions are awaited with a great deal of interest.

THE NEW DOMESTIC LOAN.

The prospectus of the proposed new domestic loan of two hundred million yen was published on Feb. 20th in an extra of the Official Gazette. The essential points of the provisions are as follows:—Interest is to be at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. For the first five years, the loan will be unredeemed after which it will be redeemed within twenty-five years. The interest is to be paid in June and December of each year. The minimum price of issuance is yen 95 and subscriptions will be accepted from March 8th to March 20th. The subscriptions will be determined not later than March 31st after which intimation will be given to the successful subscribers. Payment is to be made as follows in accordance with the rate per hundred yen: (1) yen 5 on March 31st; (2) yen 15 on April 16th—25th; (3) yen 20 on May 16th—25th; (4) yen 15 on June 16th—25th; (5) yen 20 on July 16th—25th; (6) yen 20 on August 16th—25th.

The following draft of a message from Mr. Sakatani, Minister of Finance, to Mr. Yamaza, is published:—For the purpose of defraying the expenses necessary to put all matters on a peace footing two hundred millions yen of special 5 per cent. loan bonds of the Imperial Japanese Government were issued to-day in accordance with Law No. 1, of the 39th year of Meiji. The principal conditions of the new loan are: rate of interest 5 per cent. (full half year's interest shall be specially paid in June and December); issue price, 95 yen; date of redemption 1934. The subscribers may substitute Exchequer Bonds of the 4th (mark S.) and 5th (mark G.) series redeemable from June to August this year for payment of instalments. Priority of allotment given to subscribers with Exchequer Bonds at a discount of 80 sen per hundred yen bond shall be paid when the full subscription is paid up in April. This loan is welcomed owing to the easy market and the favourable conditions we had. The National Debt Consolidation Fund Special Account Bill, which passed the Lower House, has been also unanimously approved yesterday by the special committee of the House of Peers.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

We mentioned in a recent issue that one of the Japanese prisoners, when returning from Russia, jumped into the sea and perished. This seems to have been a remarkable case. The man's name was Iwaya Uyemon, a second-class private. When the news of his captivity reached his native place, his father showed much distress and retired into strict confinement, declaring that he could not bear to look on the faces of his fellow-men after such a disgrace. By and bye he received news that his son was returning in company with other prisoners. He then indited this letter to Uyemon:—"How can you have the assurance to return alive to your native place and to meet your father and greet your fellows. It is only by giving up your body to become part of the enemy's soil that you can save your own reputation and furnish me with an excuse for your conduct." This terrible letter reached Uyemon's hands shortly before embarking and he took the earliest opportunity of throwing himself over-board.

Another suicide is reported from Kumamoto. The victim was Lt.-Colonel Kawatari. Tokyo journals say that he had a dispute with a brother-officer, and that his commanding officer recommended him to commit suicide. Colonel Kawatari resented this instruction. He said that he himself knew how to consult his own honour without advice from any one else. He waited quietly until New Year's Day and then killed himself.

There has been a meeting between Colonel Usagawa and the Committee appointed by the Progressists to investigate the question of reducing the period of service with the colours from 3 years to 2. Some secrecy is observed as to what passed at the meeting, but from newspaper reports we gather that, although the War Office has not yet elaborated any definite scheme, its inclination is to adopt a modified form of two-years' service by extending the present method of releasing soldiers who show special proficiency in their exercises. That plan, it is thought, would furnish a greater guarantee of the army's efficiency than would a hard-and-fast two years' rule.

The accounts of the New Zealand kea parrot (Nestor notabilis) forsaking its natural food, and taking to a diet of living sheep, have had a wide circulation. This bird was said to have developed the extraordinary habit of picking holes in the sides of sheep, thus wounding their intestines, and causing death. It was supposed to feed on the fat surrounding the kidneys, and this strange habit was largely quoted in works on natural history as a case of a bird acquiring new habits under new conditions of life. Dr. A. R. Wallace, for example, in his "Darwinism," quotes it as a well ascertained fact. As a consequence the kea has for some years past been persecuted almost to extinction. In some districts one sheep in three hundred was said to fall a victim to the kea. Now, however, the question is being asked, may not the kea have been too hastily condemned? In the New Zealand papers a report is given of a conference held on the subject of this parrot by representative New Zealanders at Wellington. All the members were familiar with the bird in its native haunts, yet not one of them, either from his own experience, or from the testimony of others, could bring forward a single fact to substantiate the charge of sheep-worrying. All reports as to the kea's misdeeds were traced to a single valley on Lake Wanaka, and to a single unknown observer. On the other hand a tame kea kept under observation for some time persistently refused to look at animal food! The verdict of the conference was that the charge against the kea is a myth. This is to be taken as non-proven rather than disproved, however. It is suggested as an explanation of the origin of the charge that the kea, which is of an inquiring turn of mind, had been seen surveying inquisitively the carcass of a sheep. We shall certainly hear more on the question for the kea's evil reputation seemed so surely established.

Mr. John Abernethy Kingdon, F.R.C.S., brother of the late Mr. N. P. Kingdon of Yokohama, died in London on January 5th in the 78th year of his age. Old friends of the family in Yokohama will doubtless be interested in the following extract from The Lancet :—

John Abernethy Kingdon held the office of surgeon to the City of London Truss Society for 30 years. Mr. Kingdon was not an operator but was a very ingenious mechanic and all the best improvements in the trusses used by the Society during the last 50 years came from him. He had great influence upon those within his range, which he owed partly to the confidence that his high and noble character inspired and partly to the charm of his manner and to his deep knowledge of human nature. When attention was drawn to his powers of persuasion he would say sometimes, "Yes, I understand men." It was his custom to address patients in a racy vernacular which was very attractive to them and he soon won their confidence. He had a great reverence for the Chosen People and he was never so pleased as when an old Israelite lifted up his hands to heaven and blessed him. No man better deserved the blessings of his fellow men. In all his dealings his own advantage was the last thing that he considered. He was most hospitable, generous and charitable, almost to a fault. He was a humorous, a charming, and most endearing colleague.

Dr. H. Hall Turner, Savilian Professor of Astronomy in the University of Oxford, speaking recently in London before the Royal Institution, said the question most often put to the astronomer was, were the heavenly bodies inhabited? He, however, could not himself answer it; he had to rely on the help of the physiologists. Owing to the great heat, with one or two exceptions, all the stars must be uninhabited; but the temperature of many of the planets was favourable to life. In reply to the question, therefore, "Are the planets inhabited?" he answered, "I don't know, but I feel sure they are." On Mars the so-called canals seemed to show that they were made by human beings. He paid a tribute to the discoveries in regard to Mars made by Mr. Percival Lowell, who had, inter alia, succeeded in photographing the canals on the planet. The planets were so like the earth in many respects that it seemed unreasonable to assume that life was confined to our globe. But if there was life on some of the heavenly bodies, he felt equally sure that it was very different from the life on earth. Life, for instance, was not dependent upon air, for there were certain low forms of life which exist better without air, and given the same conditions on some other planet, this lower kind of life might have developed just as we had developed. We wanted imagination when we considered questions such as this. There was little or no atmosphere on the moon, but we ought to get rid of the notion that beings must breathe air, for biologists told us that there might be intelligent beings who did not breathe air. Speaking as an astronomer, the best thing to do to investigate whether or not there was life on the planets, was not to build big telescopes, but to give the money to those scientists who were working on low temperatures in order to see whether bacteria could live in lower temperatures than had yet been obtained.

The examination of Lieut.-Commander Mizoguchi, Lieut.-Commander Kokura, Paymaster-Lieutenant Iida, Warrant-Officer Kurano and others of the ill-fated transport Kinshu Maru began on Feb. 19th at the Naval Department before Captain Ito and Commander Moriama.

The men belonging to the Tenth (Himeji) Division who recently returned from Russia were examined on Feb. 18th in their own barracks.

We read in Japanese papers that the Government bill relating to the bleaching of habutaye, which was brought forward in the Diet on February 17th and referred to a special committee, was considered by the committee on February 20th at a meeting which was attended by Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce, and Mr. Morita, Director of the Bureau of Commerce and Industry in that department. These gentlemen furnished additional information and replied to various questions, but it is understood the deliberations of the committee are not yet concluded. The Japanese press seems to be pretty unanimous in opposing the measure and the belief is generally expressed that it will be rejected by the House even if the committee approves of it. Leading manufacturers in the various centres are organizing in order to secure its being thrown out and the Yokohama Silk Goods Merchants' Guild have decided to lay similar views before both Government and Diet.

The construction of the destroyer Hayakaze at the Osaka Iron Works is reported to have been completed. She will be launched on March 7th or 8th.

Marquis Ito, Resident-General in Korea, arrived on Feb. 21st at Tsu, Ise province, on his way to his post. He was welcomed by local government officials and leading citizens. He worshiped the following day at the Ise shrine and left by the 1.25 p.m. train, for Osaka.

At 10.45 a.m. on Feb. 21st Princess Kan-in, consort of the Commander of the First Division, gave birth to a daughter.

IMPERIAL DIET.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m. on Feb. 17th. At the outset of the proceedings several reports were read by Secretary Ohara after which an application by Prince Mori for leave of absence was acceded to.

The first bill was for the amendment of the Conscript Law. General Terauchi, Minister of War, made a speech in explanation of the bill showing that modifications of the time of service were allowed to men who were staying abroad for scientific purposes. It was decided to hand the amendment to a special committee.

In the second place a bill regarding the bleaching of habutaye for export was brought in. Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce, said that the Government aimed to establish several factories with the necessary machinery and to provide regulations for the bleaching of silk, with a view to facilitating the export business and of maintaining confidence in the staple in foreign markets.

Mr. Chisaka said that the Government was not allowed to interfere in private industries and that the terms of the bill were too strict. Mr. M. Morita, one of the government delegates, replied that the proposed law had been drafted at the request of the producers, and of business experts. In reply to Mr. Nakajima, who asked whether the Government would impose a fee on an application for establishing a factory in accordance with the law, the delegate said that there would be no such charge. Mr. Hisayama asked whether the Government intended to interfere with various other industries, leaving habutaye out of the question. Mr. Matsuoka, the Minister, replied that the Government has no intention of interfering in private industries. But it must of course take steps to encourage and protect various industries if necessary. Enquiries by Mr. Y. Tanaka and replies by Mr. Morita, a Government delegate followed, after which the bill was sent to a special committee.

A third bill was that regarding the amendment of the law with reference to the Industry Guild. Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce, briefly spoke, after which the bill was handed over to a special committee without discussion.

Finally, the first reading of a bill for the special financing of the fund for the constructing of torpedo-boats was resumed. Baron Miura, Chairman of the special committee, gave a brief explanation in which he said that the bill had been passed by the Committee. The bill was then passed through the second and third readings. The House rose at 11.05 a.m.

As to the first measure on the programme, Mr. Kawamura, one of the Government delegates, briefly spoke saying that the Civil Code must be enforced in Okinawa Island (Luchu) for which purpose Art. 10 of the administrative law of the Code should be erased. The bill was sent to a special committee without discussion.

Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, spoke on two of the bills (2) regarding the assessment of building land and (3) on taxable land in cities or urban districts. Both bills were submitted to a special committee.

Bill No. 4 was also submitted to a committee as were also the successive applications. The first reading of Bill No. 12 was taken and the measure was passed through the second and third readings. Private bills 13-19 were also submitted to special committees, and the House rose at 3.37 p.m.

CUSTOM PROTESTS.

On Feb. 20th, the Directors of the Yokohama Customs delivered two decisions on protests presented by the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha and the Iwai Shoten. The Mitsui Bussan Kaisha imported straw matting which the appraisers dealt with in accordance with No. 496 of the tariff. The importers contended that the article should be treated under No. 515 of the tariff. The protest was dismissed.

The protest of the Imai Shoten, who imported cotton damask, was also rejected on the ground that the article could not be regarded as satinette or cotton Italian and that consequently it should be dealt with under No. 322 of the tariff and not No. 311 as contended by the importers.

RE-ASSESSMENT OF BUILDING LANDS.

THE Government's Bill for the re-assessment of building lands has been framed and is now in the hands of the Diet. It is a measure which has been awaited with great interest. Many years have passed since official attention was strongly directed to the unequal incidence of the land tax, agricultural lands being subjected to an impost altogether out of proportion to the amount levied on building lots. This inequality had arisen from easily comprehended causes. When the assessment was made which forms the basis of the present system of taxation, the prosperity of the principal towns and cities had been very largely impaired by the dislocation of social conditions consequent upon the abolition of feudalism, and building lots were offered in the open market at extraordinarily low rates. We ourselves can recall a time when land in Tokyo which is now worth about six thousand pounds sterling per acre, could be purchased for less than one hundredth part of that figure. Yet the official assessment, though legally subject to revision every fifth year, has remained unaltered for over 30 years. It is not to be supposed, however, that there has never been any practical recognition of the inequality. On the contrary twice during recent years building lands have been fiscally discriminated against in connexion with a general increase of the land tax. The first occasion was in 1898, when an Ito Cabinet succeeded in getting the Diet to agree to raise the tax from 2.5 per cent. of the assessed value of the land to 3.3 per cent. in the case of agricultural lands and to 5 per cent. in the case of building lands, whereas both kinds of land had hitherto been subject to the same rate (2½ per cent.). The second occasion was the Russo-Japanese war, when the rate on agricultural lots was raised to 5.5 per cent. and that on urban building lots to 20 per cent. This is a very substantial difference, but it is not thought sufficient to equalize the incidence, and thus the Bill spoken of above has been framed. Its provisions may be briefly summarized. In the first place, the proposed law provides that the land shall be re-assessed at ten times its leasing value, but that such re-assessment shall in no case exceed twenty times the figure now standing in the register. The "leasing value" here spoken of is defined as the price at which land is let on condition that the lessor makes himself responsible for all the public burdens borne by the land as well as for all reparations and necessary expenses of upkeep. It is in fact a price including actual rental, taxes and all expenses. The custom in Japan is for the lessor to fix the rent on that basis, as the State looks to him not to the lessee for the payment of imposts levied on the land. The Bill further provides that committees of assessment shall be appointed in each taxation district, the committee-men to be elected by the dual process, that is to say, the payers of taxes on building lands will elect one person for each hundred of their number, and the persons thus elected will in turn, choose seven committee men for each district. Finally, the new law enacts that the tax levied on the re-assessed values shall be the old rate of 2.5 per cent., and that the present increased war-rate, namely, 17.5 per cent., shall not be levied. It thus becomes evident that in the case of land whose re-assessment reaches the maximum figure—namely, twenty times the present assessed value—the future tax will be two-and-a-half times greater than the amount now levied. In addition to the argument suggested by the justice of taxing building land more heavily than it is taxed at present, there is the consideration that great and most unfair differences exist in the assessments within the same city. This is especially true of Tokyo. The new method will correct all this.

Another noteworthy feature of the project is that it classifies as building lands for the purpose of assessment all spaces within the fixed limits of urban jurisdiction. To understand this it is necessary to observe that within the bounds of urban and suburban Tokyo—and possibly the same is true of Kyoto and Osaka—there are considerable areas classed in the registers as "hill" or "forest" land and therefore assessed at rates so low that they may be almost said to escape taxation in toto. As a general rule these lands form the sites of villas belonging to wealthy men who lay out wide spaces in gardens. Some Tokyo papers have from time to time cried out about this abuse, but of course the owners of the land are not responsible. It is evident, however, that in the face of the new taxes men of large incomes will alone be able to indulge in the luxury of spacious gardens. Only in very remote parts of the city can land be rented for building purposes at a rate so low as 5 sen per tsubo monthly. On such land the newly assessed tax would be 15 yen per hundred tsubo, so that a garden of, say, four thousand tsubo, would have to pay 600 yen yearly, and a park of twenty thousand tsubo—by no means an uncommon thing—would be mulcted to the tune of 3,000 yen annually. Many gardens will disappear under this system. Thus once more we have Japan breaking away from her old tastes.

Building lands in Hokkaido are to be brought within the purview of the proposed law but agricultural land will be taxed for the present at the rate of 1 per cent. of its assessed value.

THE BANK OF JAPAN.

The semi-annual meeting of the Bank of Japan was held at 1.30 p.m. on Saturday, February 17th, in the Bank building. Mr. Yoshida and nineteen other officials of the Department of the Imperial Household, and Messrs. Arai and Nagahama, of the Department of Finance, were present besides the shareholders. Mr. Matsuo, Governor of the bank presided. The accounts of the last half year were submitted to the shareholders after which the Governor delivered the following address:—

GENTLEMEN,—In presenting the Bank's Business Report for the 38th year of Meiji (1905), I propose to submit for your consideration some of the cardinal points of the economic situation and of the Bank's operations during the year.

Throughout the year under review business continued to experience the effects of the war, and the general state of the market, in strong sympathy with the extraordinary situation, underwent unavoidable fluctuations and vicissitudes. Immediately on receipt of the news of the fall of Port Arthur, at the beginning of the year, people's spirits, which ever since the previous year had been depressed, showed for the first time signs of recovery. Then in March, the great victory won at the sanguinary battle of Mukden exercised a very invigorating effect, so that the economic condition gave evidence of a measure of vitality; the share-market became suddenly active; and industries which, for a time, had been extremely depressed, showed evidences of vitality, especially weaving enterprises which began rapidly to make money, while, in response to these altered conditions, bank loans increased largely as compared with the corresponding period of last year. Just then the Baltic Fleet, which had been lingering off the east coast of Africa, accomplished its eastward voyage and entered the China Sea, with the result that maritime communications were impeded, a general feeling of uneasiness was inspired, and the business world again assumed an attitude of great caution. But when the enemy's squadron was wholly destroyed in the battle at the close of May and a prospect of peace was thereafter opened, the spirit of the public rose higher than ever and business conditions underwent a complete change. Ever since the opening of the war the people had followed a policy of economy and had conspicuously reduced the degree of their expenditures, but the repeated victories encouraged them to some extent, and after the signal success in the Japan Sea these influences at length declared themselves plainly, so that purchases of goods augmented largely and there were signs of a great increase in the demand for capital.

At this point, namely, in the middle of June, the Bank raised its daily rate of interest to 2 rin. But in the beginning of September, when news of the peace negotiations was received, business conditions underwent a change. The whole people, impressed by the circumstances of the national economy, seemed to have become earnestly intent upon the enterprises that should be undertaken by them in the future. Moreover, unfavourable climatic conditions since the spring had caused failures in the crops of rice, silk and barley, and the results began to show in the realm of foreign trade. These facts helped to make business depression still greater. The close of the year brought no signs of revival, and business men all assumed an attitude of expectancy, so that the year ended in an unusually inactive state of the money market.

Such were the general conditions prevailing in the market last year. It was inevitable that the bank's loans should show corresponding variations. The loans that had been made at the close of the previous year for settlement purposes were all paid back by February, and the end of that month saw the Bank's loans reduced to something over 36 millions yen. But in consonance with the revival of business which resulted from the victories won by the country's arms, the demand for capital gradually increased after March and April, so that, by the end of July, we had given accommodation to the extent of 73 millions. In the second half of the year and in the sequel of the conclusion of the peace convention, the market fell into a state of depression, foreigners began to make larger investments in our negotiable securities, and the Bank's loans gradually came back in considerable quantity, while at the same time the amount of Treasury Bills sold in the market reached an immense sum. In the fall, the volume of convertible notes issued showed such a marked increase that they exceeded 31½ millions on the last day of the year. This was mainly in consequence of accommodation given to the Government and of the discounting of Treasury Bills, the amount lent in the open market being, on the contrary, 14 millions less than the figure for the corresponding period of the previous year.

Turning to the domain of foreign trade, we find that exports aggregated 321,530,000 yen and imports 488,520,000 yen, which totals, compared with those for the preceding year, show an increase of 2,270,000 yen in exports and actually 117,230,000 yen in imports. That imports reached this very large aggregate was mainly due to heavy purchases of military and naval stores, a phenomenon inseparable from a state of war. On the side of exports, in addition to the reduced production of the two important staples, silk and habulaye, facilities for transport were impeded, and on these accounts the exports of those articles underwent conspicuous diminution. Moreover, in consequence of the demand created by the war, articles which in ordinary times would have been sent abroad, were largely consumed at home. Yet in spite of all these things the aggregate sum of the exports is seen to have exceeded that of the previous year, which fact, inasmuch as it indicates progress in the realm of our national resources, constitutes ground for congratulation.

With regard to the Bank's transactions last year, if the business done by it in the money market was small, the functions that it performed in connexion with the national finances were, on the contrary, exceedingly large. To cite some examples. On the occasion of two issues of Exchequer bonds to the extent of 200 million yen at home, the Bank discharged all the necessary work, and when the Government despatched our Vice-Governor to London for the second time and issued three foreign loans aggregating 110 million pounds, the Bank undertook the duties of receiving and paying out the money and of handling it. These were the principal operations. For the better discharge of business relating to these loans the Bank, in addition to the agencies already established by it in London and New York, ordered our London Agency to make necessary arrangements in Berlin and to provide machinery for its transactions. Also with a view to handling the military notes circulated in Manchuria and Korea, the Bank opened agencies in the districts concerned and entrusted them with the business. Further, in September an office was established in Hiroshima. The commercial and industrial prospects of that town are not yet considerable, but, in view of the presence of a Division and of the Port Admiralty, transactions in State funds are numerous and the Bank consequently desired to increase by this Branch the facilities of monetary circulation in that locality.

Such were the economic conditions last year. Since the beginning of the war two years have elapsed and during that time the country has had on foot forces of unprecedented magnitude. Nevertheless not only were the financial demands of the situation supplied without hitch, but all undertakings progressed satisfactorily and the business world did not experience any violent convulsion. These things demonstrate the prosperity of the country, and I join with you, gentlemen, in regarding them as sources of profound congratulation.

At the beginning of the belligerent situation what this Bank had to consider most deeply was, first, that the urgent demand for war funds should be met without any impediment; secondly, that the convertible-notes system should be preserved so as to ensure general smoothness of monetary circulation; and, thirdly, that a check should be imposed on currency-inflation so as to maintain good order in economic circles. These were the three points. Bills to meet the demand for war funds passed the Diet successfully owing to the sincerity of the nation's patriotism, and the payment of the increased taxes as well as the issue of Exchequer Bonds were all happily accomplished. Only as the great extension of the war programme necessitated the import of very large quantities of articles from over-sea to supply the needs of the services, the rate of exchange was sharply affected and the Bank had to deal with many calls for specie. Happily owing to the floating of loans abroad, money could be provided to meet the demands of foreign exchanges, and thus the convertible notes' system was preserved unshaken. Further, seeing that of the war outlays a very large portion was expended in the domestic market, some apprehension existed that the evils of an inflated currency might possibly ensue. The Government, therefore, by taking account of the degree of war outlays and duly adapting thereto the time for collecting the taxes and the period for calling up payments in connexion with Exchequer Bonds, contrived to preserve a constant balance of outgoings and incomings between the market and the Treasury. Thus although the sums disbursed up to the end of last year on account of war outlays reached some 1,301 million yen, the evil of currency inflation was averted and normal conditions were firmly maintained in economic circles. That the financing of the war could be managed in such a manner as to show this satisfactory outcome must be attributed to the nation's unanimity and to the complete harmony with which all parts of the machine worked, our national economy thus exhibiting results which deserve to be long remembered in company with the glory of the Empire's victories.

Our business world is now gradually reverting to a condition of peace, and not only is the supply of capital in the home market very abundant, but also our financial credit being established with increasing firmness abroad, capital tends to flow into the country in considerable quantity. Thus we have reached a time when the development of various enterprises is at hand. Only when it comes to planning these enterprises unless officials and civilians alike profoundly consider the manner in which capital is to be employed and unless they take into due account our labour capacity and our supply of materials, there is no assurance that a disturbance of economic conditions may not ensue. I am persuaded, however, that those who engage in these enterprises will bring to the task judgment, proficiency, a due regard for local conditions and a sense of order, and that in the development of post-bellum economy they will make no errors of calculation. I, too, in dealing with the business of the Bank, hope to steadily follow these lines of policy.

FIRES.

There has been quite an epidemic of fires recently but to what, if any, cause other than negligence they are to be attributed does not appear.

On Feb. 15th, fire broke out at Ifukuro near Nagoya destroying several houses. Four children of a widow named Ito Suwe were killed.

Fire broke out on the morning of Feb. 15th in the factory of the Settsu Cotton Spinning Co., Osaka, burning down three buildings.

At 9 a.m. on Feb. 18th, fire broke out in the Railway Industry Bureau in the compound of Shimbashi Railway Station, destroying three buildings.

Early on the morning of the same day an outbreak of fire occurred at Shin-Minato-cho, Kyobashi, burning down eleven houses.

On the morning of Feb. 18th, the residence of Baron Taku, in Saga, was burned down.

Early on the morning of Feb. 19th, fire broke out in Tani-machi, Azabu, Tokyo. Owing to the strong northerly wind, the flames spread at once, destroying two hundred and twenty-eight houses and damaging ten others. There is not yet any definite information as to the cause. A few firemen were injured.

A Mito telegram, say that the same morning an outbreak of fire took place at Torite-machi, burning down seventy buildings including the Torite Bank. The previous night, a fire occurred in the village of Kawata destroying forty houses.

An explosion occurred on Feb. 16th at the fire-work factory, Kameido, Tokyo. Five persons were injured and one is in a serious state.

An official telegram says that on the night of Feb. 17th, fire broke out in the village of Nishikami, Yamaguchi prefecture. Fifteen dwellings, nineteen godowns and sheds were burned down.

The well-known Buddhist temple Kongoji at Takinokawa, a village near Tokyo, famous for its maple forests, was burned down on the night of Feb. 17th.

At 3 p.m. on Feb. 18th, fire broke out in Makuhari-machi, Chiba prefecture. Owing to the strong northerly wind, the flames extended swiftly and destroyed forty houses.

A large fire occurred on the morning of Feb. 19th in Taira, Fukushima prefecture, burning down a little over six hundred houses.

The Austrian steamer Kobe, which arrived in Yokohama from Singapore on Wednesday, was found to be on fire in No. 3 hatch where fish manure was stored. Shortly before the fire was discovered a quantity of dynamite had been removed from the vessel. The hatch where the fire was smouldering was at once closed down and measures taken to extinguish the flames. The damage is still unknown.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE
CURRENT LITERATURE.

The New Year's number of the Seikō (Success), a magazine that lays itself out to provide interesting reading matter for young men, has an article entitled "How do men think?" in which various well known men recount their experiences as to mental operations and processes and as to the occasions most conducive to hard-thinking. Here is the substance of what is said on these subjects.

Dr. E. Mayeda.—When I lie awake at night fine thoughts float through my mind, or rather what appear then to be fine thoughts. But when I review these thoughts while sitting in my chair the next morning, I am astonished at their silliness. I have no fixed time for thinking. But my best thoughts most frequently come in the morning. I usually think best in my study, but sometimes walking gives activity to my mind. My first thoughts are hazy and sketchy. They become clear and minute by degrees.

* Mr. Ozaki Yukio.—I am no very deep thinker at any time. My mind begins to work when there is a definite subject to think about, and then I have to walk. It is no matter whether I march up and down my room or through Ginza, I solve my mental problems and am visited by the brightest ideas when on the move. As to time and place, to me they are comparatively indifferent.

Mr. Takekoshi Yosaburō.—With me the first thoughts are always the best thoughts. This is the case with the deepest as well as the shallowest of my thoughts. And my writing is like my thinking. I dash off my thoughts on paper as they occur to me and all my subsequent corrections are confined to the alteration of words or phrases only. The whole cast of thought remains as it was when it first took shape in the mind.

Mr. Naitō Meisetsu.—I compose hokku (comic verses) in my mind at any time, morning, noon or night, sitting, lying, walking, or eating. The ideas come first and then the words wherewith to express them.

Mr. Hirotsu Ryūrō.—My most vivid impressions are in the dark. This is perhaps the result of habit, but to me darkness is so favourable for thought that I sometimes darken my room. I do most of my thinking in my own room, but sometimes when out of doors the sight of an unusual object sets up a train of thought. Thought first comes as a skeleton; it is subsequently supplied with flesh.

Mr. Kiriwaki Genyoku.—With me the best time for thinking is at night when consciousness is not over active. I write best at night after idling about all the day. Occasionally when walking some bright thought enters my mind.

Mr. Iwaya Shōren.—I think best when it is raining gently; specially in the stillness of night when my neighbours are all quiet and all nature seems to be at rest. Even then the soft pattering of the rain appears to assist my brain.

Mr. Abe Iso-o.—Night is my time for thinking. In the day I am usually too busy to find leisure for quiet thought. I think most in my study, but often while listening to a speech suddenly ideas float across my mind.

Mrs. Tanahashi Ayako.—My best thoughts come to me when I am busy; then my mind is on the stretch. In idle hours my mind appears to go to sleep. Contact with the outer world seems necessary to my mental activity. There have been times when I have pondered over something for a long time without being able to reach a satisfactory conclusion, and then when in the middle of some work the solution to my difficulty has come.

Mr. Murai Chishitsu.—When reading an idea often comes to me. I then close the book and shut my eyes and ponder over it. Whether it be a thought that absorbs my whole mind, or whether it only impresses me slightly, I make a record of it in my note book to be used in a speech or in some other way in the future. I do little thinking apart from reading; contact with other minds by means of books makes my mind active and new thoughts come bubbling up.

Mr. Nakayama Kamenosuke.—I spend half of my time in studying special subjects or in receiving visitors. The other half I devote to the solution of various problems. Taking easy and difficult ones together, I solve on an average about ten per day. In one book there may be some 600 questions which need explanation. I can get through them all in two months. There are some problems that, ponder as I may, I can't solve. To go puzzling over them for days is useless. So I go off to other subjects, often with the result that suddenly I find a satisfactory solution. Sometimes the solution comes to me in the stillness of night after going to bed.

Mr. Katayama Kuniyoshi.—To me it seems that thinking must always be guided by action. How many are the things that seem theoretically perfect to us, yet when carried into practice they prove to be more or less failures. We must think in order to act aright, but the very direction of our thoughts is often decided by the experiences of life. Numerous failures teach us how to think to some purpose.

The "Character Sketches" portion of the Taiyō is specially good this month. Mr. Toyabe Shunkō's comments on the new government in an article entitled "Count Katsu and Marquis Saionji," display keen insight into the peculiar political situation in Japan to-day. We give below a full summary of this thoughtful essay.

The substitution of the Saionji Cabinet for the Katsura must be regarded as the inevitable result of the progress of political thought and the spirit of the age. But it would be an entire mistake to suppose that the Saionji Cabinet is in any sense a Party Cabinet. It is true that Marquis Saionji has always been regarded as a representative of the people; and as head of the Seiyūkai he may be considered as representing party politicians. In theory he no doubt approves of party-government, but when he was called on to form a Cabinet he had to choose men of acknowledged capacity and the Seiyūkai was not able to furnish a sufficient number of tried statesmen in whom the country has confidence. So he gave up the idea of forming a Party Cabinet. If in theory Party Cabinets are the most desirable of Cabinets, then the present Cabinet is a failure. Let us analyze its constitution. Mr. Katō Takaaki, the Foreign Minister, is an independent gentleman connected with no party. Mr. Matsuoka Kōki, the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, is an official who has hitherto been connected with the Court of Administrative Litigation (Gyōsei Saibansho). Mr. Sakatani Yoshirō was Vice-Minister of the Department of Finance up to the time of his appointment. Mr. Yamagata Isaburō, the Minister of Communications, was formerly Vice-Minister of the Home Office. Rear-Admiral Saitō, hitherto Vice-Minister of the Naval Department, has now become Minister. General Terauchi remains Minister of War. Mr. Makino Shinken is a diplomat who has hitherto kept aloof from home politics altogether. The Seiyū-kai is represented in the Cabinet by the President, the Home Minister, Mr. Hara Kei, and by the Minister of Justice, Mr. Matsuda Masahisa, only. Though the Cabinet does not represent a party, it may be said to represent most of the provinces. Hara and Saitō come from Iwate-ken, and hence represent the North-Eastern part of Japan; Sakatani comes from Okayama, and hence represents Chūgoku. Matsuoka comes from Tokushima, and hence represents Shikoku (Awa, Sanuki, Iyo and Tosa). Matsuda comes from Hizen, and thus represents Kyūshū. Terauchi and Yamagata come from Yamaguchi and Makino from Kagoshima; so the three may be said to represent the two great clans of Satsuma and Chōshū. Though it is of course accidental that the Cabinet should have this geographical character, yet it is interesting to observe how every part of the empire contributes its quota to the administrative ability possessed by the new Cabinet. The Cabinet is thus before all things a national Cabinet. And this is the sort of Cabinet that the country desires to-day. It desires a Cabinet whose principle it is to throw open the highest positions in the State to the whole country and select talent wherever it is found. A Cabinet founded on talent embodies the best knowledge, capacity and character which the nation has to offer.* A Cabinet cannot be considered to be thoroughly efficient unless it rests on talent. But the members of a Cabinet, while embodying the highest talent the nation has to give, may not agree as to political principles and so as a Government may not succeed. To combine all the varied powers of Ministers so as to make the Cabinet act as one man is no easy work. But as Japan is situated to-day, it is far safer to rely on talent for the formation of Cabinets than on political parties. And if it be asked who has most talent, officials or members of political parties, the answer is officials. Beyond a few office-holders in the Seiyūkai and the Shimpotō there are no very talented men. And this is the chief reason why the formation of an efficient Party Cabinet is at present impossible.

Count Katsura has during his tenure of office regarded political parties with hostility. Why? Because he has been at the head of a Cabinet formed of non-party officials. In theory he has all along been opposed to allowing political parties to control the Cabinet. But he has found that in practice he could not afford to ignore them altogether. So he did much to appease them by various compromises.

There were politicians who thought that Marquis Saionji would attempt to form a Party Cabinet, but they did not know the Marquis. Though the head of the Seiyūkai, he has not made use of his position to oppose the Katsura Cabinet. He helped that Cabinet throughout the war and even when it came a cropper at Portsmouth, he treated it leniently. He is a far-seeing and well-balanced statesman. He perceived plainly enough that in the present condition of Japanese politics no very radical change of principle in the formation of the Cabinet is possible. So the difference between the present Cabinet and the Katsura Cabinet is small and the resemblance great (Sono naikaku no jissshitsu wa zennaikaku to dai-dō-shū-i (大同小異) narasaru yoo yezaru wa tozen narazu ya). The change of Cabinet did much to appease the nation, smearing as it was under the Portsmouth fiasco. The Katsura Government could never have withstood the attacks of the political parties in the Diet. Dissolution might have followed dissolution at a critical time in the history of the country.

It is too soon to expect the organisation of a thoroughly representative national Cabinet. Non-party official Cabinets doubtless do harm, as the statesmen who compose them invariably regard political parties as their foes. Hence there arises injurious friction between the executive and the legislature. The blending of official and party elements in a Cabinet in such a way as to give the chief power to the leaders of the party that commands the highest majority in the Diet, is what is most desirable at the present time. But after all Cabinets like other governing bodies depend for their success on the characters of the men composing them. The notion that agreement as to the policy to be pursued is going to make government efficient is a great mistake. "Men are governed by their characters rather than by maxims" observed Disraeli. . . . It seems to us that the time has come for party politicians and non-party officials to regard each other with friendly eyes. Modern officials can no longer be justly denounced as the perpetrators of clannism. Most of them have no clan sympathy at all. The fact that they have long been in Government service should not be considered a disqualification for the occupation of seats in the Cabinet alongside of party politicians. And the two kinds of administrators, the temporary party politician and the permanent Government official should recognise and appreciate each other's merits. The formation of the present Cabinet is a step in that direction.

There are some who say that Marquis Saionji is unsuited for his part as head of the Seiyū-kai, that his ways are too gentle, his views too broad and impartial to allow of his leading a number of headstrong politicians. But facts are more convincing than mere theories, and it is true that the Seiyū-kai was never better governed than it is now. Doubtless there has been some disappointment that more members of the party were not asked to join the Cabinet, but the general confidence in the soundness of his great talents are a guarantee that the party will continue to back the Marquis in his new capacity as Minister-President. But upon his ability to solve some of the big problems that now confront the Government, upon his power to get rid of many of the obstructions which have harassed every modern Cabinet in this country will depend his permanent reputation as a statesman.

Here is the substance of Mr. Toyabe's comments on the character of the late Mr. Fukuchi Ōchikōji (Genichirō). A man who ranks high among the talented men of the Meiji era has passed away. Mr. Fukuchi was neither a learned man nor a great man in the moral sense of the word great, but for ability there were few of his contemporaries that approached him. But he had the misfortune of being almost entirely without will, and hence it happened that he made no great career for himself. His talents were used by others to compass their ends, but were not employed by himself for the carrying out of any great purpose. Though deficient in will, he was a man of very strong emotions. Hence he was frequently powerfully influenced by others to the detriment of his own character. Capacity and strong feeling combined without strength of purpose to control them constantly led him astray. He had much common-sense and a knowledge of men and affairs; so that his errors could never be attributed to ignorance. They were the result of innate irresolution. The one great success of his life was obtained in the field of journalism. No one in this country has rivalled him as a newspaper writer. His fine style, which combined a variety of rare qualities, was for some time the admiration of all lovers of good literature. He subsequently tried his hand at fiction and drama; but he cannot be said to have scored any great success in these branches of literature. The reason was that he had no poetry in him. He was essentially a practical man of the present age—not a dreamer nor a man with much imagination. The deeper questions of life he never tackled. They did not interest him. His merits as a writer lay in his polished style and in his intimate acquaintance with history and modern affairs. Had he been more philosophical he would have resembled Macaulay.* But as it was he was a man with no higher ideals than those of an ordinary worldly man. He was essentially an optimist, living in the present with no thought or care for the future (Edo-ko kishitsu de, yoisoshi no shimpai nado ni kuttaku suru hō de nai).

There are some who regarded Mr. Fukuchi as a man with no moral principles nor deep convictions. He certainly did not come up to the highest ideal of moralists, but the intense sincerity of his nature made him very lovable. He always appeared as he was and abominated hypocrisy. He objected to the restraints and restrictions which other men sought to impose on him. It is doubtless true, however, to say that he had not sufficient will to practise self-denial. This was one of his greatest defects.

There are two kinds of talent, natural talent and talent that has been acquired by contact with the world. It was this latter that Mr. Fukuchi had. Hence numerous were the channels into which it flowed. He was fond of trying his hand at all sorts of things and consequently often suffered the consequences of his adventurous spirit. He once indulged in speculation in shares, involving himself in great loss. Had Mr. Fukuchi been a man with a stronger will, he certainly would have become a noted statesman; for he possessed so many qualifications that go to make a successful statesman. At the beginning of the Meiji era he was one of the chief Secretaries of the Dajōkwan * Macaulay used to say that he was no philosopher and that his tastes did not lie that way. It all depends on what kind of philosophy is referred to. Of the English practical philosophy Macaulay had more than most men. But the more abstruse German philosophical speculation, he said, he never could comprehend.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY).

(Council of State, abolished in 1885), a contemporary officer of Viscount Yoshikawa. Had he continued to serve the Government, he would doubtless have become a Minister of State years ago. But he had a contempt for official life and official ways. At various times he was closely associated with some of Japan's greatest statesmen; with Kido, Itō and Yamagata. But he made no special use of his connection with men of high rank for the purpose of self-advancement. He was absolutely without ambition. He was a man whose whole life was governed by varied emotions. His feelings, like an Eolian harp, were played on by every passing breeze. No appeal to his feelings could he resist. His acts were the results of the last impressions he had received. He was one of the most tender-hearted men that ever lived. In this lay the beauty of his life. His two chief endowments were great intellectual power and high emotional susceptibility.

The translation of Milton's "Paradise Lost" by Mr. Tsuchii Bansui, of the Second High School, began to appear in the January Taiyō. The style is what is known as the Shintaisi (New Style Poetry) which for many years past has been made use of for the rendering of Western poems into Japanese. Here are a few lines as a specimen of the style:

*Ningen waga yo no
Hayime no haka;
Shinmei (神命) somukite,
Tsumitaru konomi,
Mukui ni nayami to Eden no horobi,
Hiki-ite sekai ni
Kitarishi kano shi (死).*

"Of man's first disobedience and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world and all our woe,
With loss of Eden."

Mr. Tsuchii's rendering of some of the finer passages seems to us to show that he has thoroughly understood them and entered into their spirit. Mr. Tsuchii has made a special study of poetry for many years past and it may confidently be predicted that this translation of his will take precedence of all the renderings of Milton's sublimest poem which have appeared in Japan. It will doubtless be published in book form when the whole poem has been translated.

To the February Taiyō Dr. Matsumura Jinzō, a well known botanist, contributes an excellent article on the necessity of reviving an interest in their own beautiful and expressive language among the Japanese. The title of his article is *Jidai (事大) Shugi wo manakarezaru kokugo (A Native Tongue Enthralled)**. We very much fear that loudly as he may pipe Dr. Matsumura will not get many Japanese to dance to his music. His article is a spirited with attack on the position which Chinese holds in this country at the present time. But he will effect nothing. Japan's growing intimacy with the Chinese and the development of Japanese business in China will most certainly give a fresh impetus to the study of the ideographs. Yet much of what Dr. Matsumura says is all too true. The Japanese of to-day grow up knowing little of their own language. Chinese, English, German are more highly thought of than the sweet-sounding, highly expressive language used with such power by men like Enchō. The contempt for Kana and Romaji alike was never greater than it is to-day, says Dr. Matsumura. We have no words sufficiently strong to denounce the silly infatuation in the use of Chinese ideographs even for names, he continues. Here are his own words which are worth quoting as they stand: Nihonjin to iu kokumin wa kokugo, kokubun wo keibetsu shite iru to iu mono de, kore wo kokugo to ii, yahi (野卑) to yobi, sude ni monji no na saye kari-ji (假字) to kaite, hanji wo sashite honji (本字) to shō shite iru no de aru. Sono bakage kitaru koto *gongo, dōdan nan to keiyō no shiyo mo nai.** A style known as the Gembun-itchi (Union of the written and spoken languages) is now greatly in fashion. Certain writers are venturing to write somewhat as they speak. But by the literary purists this method of writing is denounced as chimpunkan (Double Dutch); despite the fact that highly educated people manage to understand each other by means of this language. No; in our silly infatuation for Chinese nothing is grand that is not written in Chinese. Dr. Matsumura, after going on in this strain for some time, proceeds to advocate the use of Yamato-kotoba instead of Chinese wherever possible. He says rightly that the old Romaji-kai failed and the new Romaji-kai will fail because no serious attempt is made to substitute pure Japanese words for the imported Chinese terms. Dr. Matsumura maintains that this is quite possible. In his own special subject, botany, he has tried the experiment of finding purely Japanese equivalents for the Latin technical names of plants, flowers, and herbs, &c. He furnishes an interesting list of Latin names and their Japanese equivalents. We give a few specimens to show how much shorter the Japanese term is usually than its Latin equivalent. Radix fusiformis; Japanese, tsumune; Radix napiformis; kaburane. Folia amplexicaulia; idakiba; Folia decurrentia; nagareba. Folia quadrilobata, yotsugireba. Folia tripartita; mitsugireba. Inflorescentia; hanabusa. Filamentum; shibito. Embryo; megomori.

Dr. Matsumura maintains that were serious efforts made by Japanese patriots to develop and use their own tongue to the exclusion of Chinese as far as possible, the capabilities of that tongue would astonish everybody. In the case of the unavoidable use of Chinese words he would attach to them the Japanese rendering only. Dr. Matsumura's theory has had many advocates in past years, but the bulk of the nation is wedded to the ideograph and still considers an eye-language infinitely superior to an ear-language. In Japan conversation is slurred. The Japanese are precise only when they begin to write. This evil Dr. Matsumura deplors and would remedy. But to us it seems that he has undertaken a Herculean task.

A few months ago the Kyōiku-kai (Educational World) sent out papers to all the leading educationists in the empire asking each one to name the man that he thought should be appointed Minister of Education, that is, the man who in his conception would best further the cause of sound national education. The results are given in the following list of names and votes:—Dr. Katō Hiroyuki 149 votes; Marquis Saionji, 125; Dr. Hamano, 86; Mr. G. Ōta, 84; Mr. Ozaki Yukio, 75; Mr. Matsudaira Masanawo, 71; Mr. Yamakawa Kenjiro, 71; Baron Suyematsu, 70; Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku, 67; Dr. Kikuchi Dairoku, 65; Mr. Matsuda Masahisa, 23, Admiral Tōgō, 20; Mr. Takata Sanai, 11; Mr. Ebara Soroku, 5; Dr. Hatoyama, 3. Among those who only obtained one vote are the names of Mr. Yano, Dr. Uyeda Mannen, Mr. Sawayanagi Masatarō and Dr. Tomizu.

Count Ōkuma contributes an article to the Kyōikukai on the relation of the University to the Government. He begins by pointing out that the general public is quite ignorant of the nature of this relation. It is supposed by many that the Imperial University Professors enjoy no liberty at all. Hence they are often denounced as a set of trimmers and sycophants. It is said they pervert learning to suit prevailing political opinions. This, says Count Ōkuma in effect, is partly true partly false. From the Fujiwara days onward in this country successive Governments have regarded the educational institutions of the country as existing partly with the object of teaching the young subjection to the powers that be. Schools have been among the engines of government. The executive has always claimed the right to decide what shall and what shall not be taught in state schools. To a certain extent the exercise of this right is doubtless necessary. But it has been carried too far, and instead of simply insisting on the teaching of subjection to authority in the abstract, attempts have been made to use the University as a means of supporting certain political opinions, that is, as an organ of Government. This, of course, means that each party in turn that happens to be in power will insist on having the support of the officials who teach in the University. There is no doubt that the relation of the Executive to the great seats of learning in Tōkyō and Kyōto needs readjusting on a new basis. The sacredness and independence of learning must be secured beyond all possibility of attack or abuse. Our professors must be freed from the trammels that have hitherto bound them and be allowed to teach what they please within reasonable limits. The interference with this liberty in the past has been of frequent occurrence. Not so very long ago the President of the University, Mr. Yamakawa, in a public address in the presence of high Mombushō officials denounced the vulgarities, corruption and evil practices of the present time, and said that to a certain extent the University itself was responsible for these evils. He was subsequently asked by the Mombushō to withdraw his statements as too severe. He refused to do so, asserting that what he had said was true. He was right. And until the feeling which he has respecting the position the University holds in the country prevails among its professors and in Government circles as well we shall never have an ideal University. Undoubtedly the tone of the University influences the tone of every section of Japanese Society. The storm in the University is no abnormal phenomenon, but a result of a state of atmosphere of long continuance which was bound to result in a tempest sooner or later.

* "The Japanese are a nation that despise their own language and literature. calling their own language a vulgar (unrefined) tongue and pronouncing it to be barbaric. Already they have decided that when their own symbols are used for names even they shall be called 'temporary signs' (kana), and the ideographs be referred to as the 'permanent real signs.' The silliness of all this defies description. No adjectives can be found sufficiently strong to apply to it."

In an article contributed to the Kyōkoku Baron Kaneko gives his view on the policy that Japan should pursue in education. He tells us that during his residence in the United States three subjects have been especially investigated by him: Politics, Finance and Learning. As a result of minute inquiry into the educational system of America he has come to the conclusion that Japan has a very bright educational future before her. He is of opinion that in religion and morals she has nothing to learn from the West, and as regards other things she will learn all there is of value to be taught. He is an advocate of teaching Chinese in this country as much even as English is now taught.

On Japan's financial outlook it is difficult for anybody but experts to come to a satisfactory conclusion. In the course of our reading we have come across almost every shade of opinion on the subject. Speaking roughly, writers may be divided into three classes, optimists, pessimists and middle-course thinkers. Dr. T. Amano, the editor of the Tōyō Keisai Zasshi, is a pessimist and he is now giving full vent to his pessimism in the pages of that journal. He no doubt has many followers. Japan is a comparatively poor country and she has suddenly been forced to contract very heavy debts. That the nation can flourish financially despite the heavy war taxes is seriously doubted by quite a number of publicists. Dr. Amano does not, however, voice these doubts; he advocates the increase of taxation. He says that there are two things to be feared in the world. One is the existence of fools; the other the accumulation of debts. After pointing out that as regards individuals, he that "goes borrowing goes a-sorrowing" he proceeds to show that the same may be said of States. Japan regards with dangerous complacency the growth of her national debts. England's national debt at the close of her last war with France gave the nation the greatest concern, and the statesmen of that time said it was a question whether the debt would destroy England or England pay off the debt. The steps that were taken to lessen the debt proved successful and hence England's prosperity grew apace. Now, our running up heavy debts during the war was unavoidable, proceeds Dr. Amano, and we had to raise loans in foreign countries on which we have to pay interest in specie. But now that the war is over, as far as possible these foreign loans should be gradually paid off. If necessary we should raise domestic loans in order to do this. The payment of interest on domestic loans involves no export of specie. But the time has now come for the substitution of extra taxation for the raising of loans. Yet this necessity has not been recognized by our Government nor by our political parties. To us it seems that our foreign loans should be reduced without delay. One reason for this lies in the fact that our imports from year to year are enormously in excess of our exports. This means that we are paying out large sums of money to foreign firms. This and the interest on our heavy debts constitute a double drain on the country's specie. Dr. Amano predicts high prices as a result of the war, but he thinks that we shall also witness great activity in the industrial world.

The Gakutō, Maruya's organ, opens this month with a history of this big importing firm. The Maruzen Kabushiki Kaisha has been in existence 40 years. It now tells us that it does business with some 600 publishing firms. It claims, perhaps justly, to have contributed largely to the growth of enlightenment in Japan. It aims at keeping its prices as low as possible, its principles are large sales and small profits on each sale. In order to be able to carry out this plan, the firm has had to reduce its working expenses to as low a figure as possible. The shop in Tōkyō where most of its books are sold is to-day what it was 20 years ago. Useless ornamentation and even certain conveniences have been foregone for the sake of carrying out the determination of the Directors to furnish the public with the best books on all subjects at the cheapest possible rates. In all its various branches the same books are sold at the same prices despite the varying prices of transport. The firm claims to be actuated by public spirit in all its transactions.

THE BOOKSELF.

"O. S. K. Guide to Formosa."

The Osaka Shosen Kaisha, whose flag is well-known in Formosan and adjacent Chinese waters, have issued a useful and interesting guide to those regions in the form of an illustrated folder. Particularly noteworthy in this publication are the views and information relating to Formosa. The company's steamers leave Keelung four times a month and circumnavigate the island, a distance of about 550 miles, calling at the Pescadores, Anping, Takao, Taihanroku and Garambi in the extreme south, returning to their port of departure along the east coast with calls at Pinan, Karenko and So O, a route which ought to become highly attractive to those in search of the novel and picturesque. There is also a description of Hokuto, the health resort of North Formosa (the medicinal spring of which was only discovered by a foreigner in 1894), where it appears foreigners may obtain superior hotel accommodation in European style amid beautiful surroundings and in a healthy climate.

Six Women, by VICTORIA CROSS: London, T. Werner Laurie.

VICTORIA CROSS, we presume, is a pen-name. Whether it shrouds a man or a woman it is difficult to tell, for though the writer's style is distinctly neurotic, it is not sufficiently individualistic to disclose the identity of sex. A man could have written some parts of the book, but others again must have required the subtle feminine instinct of intuition ere they could have been evolved. The book is composed of short stories dealing with the loves of six different women, and all save one have India, the Soudan, Syria, or Palestine for background; the exception carries us to an English watering place. Throughout the book a vein of sadness runs mingled with the brighter skeins woven by passionate love or gratified desire and death enters into four of the stories, irresistibly and inexorably, leaving a bitter aftertaste to the light and gladness which preceded his entry, though in each case "there was no other way." The longest story deals with the tragedy of an English police magistrate, whose wife practically passes out of his life by her own desire on their wedding-day and thereafter refuses to join him in India. At the age of 40 he falls in love with a dancing girl of the Deccan and life begins to blossom for him. The scenes amid which this idyll is played are told with graphic intensity and by one familiar with the life depicted. Into poor Hamilton's paradise comes the English wife, who up till that time, had refused the companionship of her husband, and a tragedy is soon enacted. The other stories, though much shorter, are capably told, each character standing out well and dominating its own particular scene.

DEATH OF MR. HARVEY THOMSON.

We announce with regret the death of Mr. Harvey A. Thomson, a native of Belhelvie in Aberdeenshire, who had been in the service of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for a considerable number of years and was greatly liked and respected by many friends afloat and on shore. Mr. Thomson became ill on the 4th of this month and was unable to accompany the Hiogo Maru, of which ship he had been chief engineer for about a year, on her last trip to the Bonin Islands. He seemed to be making a good recovery from his ailment, (pneumonia,) under the treatment of Dr. Davis, but on Thursday at 6 p.m. heart failure took place and he died very suddenly.

The deceased gentleman was twin brother of Mr. R. S. Thomson, of the Japan Brewery Company, who had like himself been years in the employment of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. They were children of the minister of Belhelvie, and Harvey, after serving at Abernethy's works in Aberdeen and spending some time at the Woolwich Arsenal, went to sea in the Glen line and afterwards came to Japan where he was in the employment of the now defunct Upton line. He joined the Nippon Yusen Kaisha 12 years ago, was on the first ship that crossed the Pacific for the company, and afterwards on their Bombay and Australian lines. Mr. Thomson was a man of sterling qualities and his removal at the comparatively age of 47 will be deeply regretted by all who knew him. He leaves a widow with whom the most respectful sympathy will be felt.

On Saturday afternoon the mortal remains of Mr. Harvey A. Thomson, were consigned to their last resting place in the Yokohama Cemetery in the presence of a large number of mourners. A short service took place at 4 p.m. in the residence No. 52 Bluff and on arrival at the grave side Rev. E. S. Booth who had conducted the first part, concluded the ceremony, Bishop Awdry, of Tokyo, speaking a few touching words embodying his personal knowledge of the deceased on whose ship he had been a passenger. Particularly he spoke of Mr. Thomson's honesty and simplicity of heart and of the constant place that his home occupied in his thoughts, and said that all he knew of the deceased was good.

The chief mourners were Mrs. Thomson (widow) and Mr. R. S. Thompson (brother), who were followed by Mr. and Mrs. O. Gillon Mr. and Mrs. J. Thom and other friends. The pallbearers were Mr. N. Chin, assistant superintendent, N.Y.K., Capt. Noma of the Kumamoto Maru, and the following officers of the Company:—Captain Young, Captain Keith, Messrs. Winckler, Andersen, Hurry, Sutherland, and Cunningham. Among the other Japanese officers of the company present were Messrs. J. Atsumi, assistant-manager; J. Kutsukaki, purser, Yokohama, Y. Yoshioka, etc.

Many floral tributes were sent including a large and beautiful wreath from the President (Mr. R. Kondo) of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

"Its an ill wind that blows nobody any good," remarked the President of the Yokohama Literary Society on Friday night when introducing Mr. Frank H. Pixley, who had very kindly consented at short notice to fill the principal part in the Society's fortnightly "bill." Had not bad colds and influenza struck down so many singers the evening would have been devoted to the opera of "Maritana," with a short address by Mr. A. W. Quinton. But this pleasure is merely postponed. Meanwhile the society spent a thoroughly enjoyable evening. Mr. Pixley, the author of some of the most successful musical plays of recent years, is visiting Japan seeking "local colour" for a new play, and his very kind and illuminating address of Friday evening took the form of a description of how musical plays and light operas are produced. Mr. Pixley, at the outset said he only wrote plays: he did not explain them, neither did he excuse them. In the lighter form of dramatic work it seemed to him that it was almost impossible for a play or character to fail. "We have so much advice given to us by the public, and a very large part of it good advice, that I cannot see how any play can fail." Mr. Pixley gave some amusing examples of the kind of advice which he personally had received and then said the only object of a musical play was to amuse or distract the minds of people for a few hours from the more serious side of life. No matter what people might say as to what the stage should be, as far as the American stage was concerned its primary object was not educational, but to amuse; and the dramatist who at night helped to amuse lives that by day forgot to smile was certainly deserving of credit as a public benefactor. (Applause.) A modern musical play, if it was to succeed, must appeal simultaneously to the eye, to the ear, and to the intelligence. To the eye through the pretty costumes and picturesque scenery; to the ear through attractive, catchy music; and to the intelligence through the brightness of the lines and the ability of the caste. The first step in the writing of a musical play had nothing to do with its construction or with the caste, but in the selection of a proper location. It was necessary that some location be selected that would allow opportunities to give costumes that appealed to the eye. A comic opera must have backbone just the same as a novel—there must be a certain climax, and one of the first things to be done was to select the characters. Mr. Pixley recounted the difficulties experienced in choosing the caste—from the prima donna, with a voice capable of faultlessly reaching the upper "C," to the chorus, say, of forty women and twenty men, of whom the women thought there were generally eighteen too many. He next referred to the time and attention given to the lyrics and musical settings which were written time and again before the author and composer were satisfied with their work. The finale to "King Dodo," for instance, was the eighteenth march written before the final selection was made. Details were next given of the preparation in the staging of a play, such as the painting of scenery, the arrangement of the electric light and the stage proper, etc., and the work of the costumer, it being mentioned that for an ordinary play, including the choruses, there were required about eight hundred costumes. When at last all this was arranged, there came the work of rehearsing the play. The rehearsals generally occupied about five weeks, about ten hours a day being devoted to the work. After five solid weeks of rehearsal there came the dress rehearsal, in which all the elements of a comic opera were for the first time brought together. Every person was then in costume, and every stick of property was in its place on the stage. A dress rehearsal usually began at six o'clock, and lasted until five or six the following morning. After this came the "first night." At the first production before the public everyone taking part was usually tired out, wearied by the long excitement and intense nervous strain. And then came the verdict of the public on the result of all the long weeks of hard labour involved. If the play met with approval on the part of the first night audience it usually meant a successful season; if, on the other hand, the audience did not like the play, that one performance might mean the loss of some thirty or forty thousand dollars. Mr. Pixley brought a bright and amusing talk to a close by quoting some lyrics from his own operas and plays which left his audience in the condition of Oleiver Twist, asking for more, for rounds of applause were evoked when the President rose and moved a vote of thanks to him.

The musical portion of the programme consisted solely of songs by gentlemen singers. Mr. Somerton, who was in magnificent voice, contributed "The Storm Fiend" and "The Yeoman's Wedding." Dr. Emerson sang "The Border Ballad," and "Why not ask me?"; Mr. Gibson, a new-comer, sang very sympathetically "Love's Sorrow"; and Mr. Quinton and Mr. Somerton sang the duet "Larboard Watch" in a most attractive fashion, making their hearers wish that they had appeared before together on local platforms. At the next meeting of the Society a paper on "Genzai Murai" by Mr. E. B. Clarke, will be read.

THE LAW COURTS.

PETITION FOR DEPRIVATION OF PARENTAL RIGHTS.

The hearing of an appeal filed by Mrs. Julia Dubois against a judgment given by the Yokohama Local Court, began on Feb. 16th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nagata.

It may be noted that Mrs. Julia Dubois asked the lower Court for a decision releasing Mr. Jules Dubois, who is one of the administrators of the will of the late Mr. Charles L. Dubois, from that office. The petition was dismissed and Mrs. Dubois accordingly appealed.

At the outset of the hearing, the Court was closed, the proceedings being conducted in camera.

The case in which Mr. Jules Dubois petitions for the deprivation of the parental rights of Mrs. Julia Dubois came up again on Feb. 19th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nagata.

Dr. Paul Ritter, Swiss Consul-General, was examined as a witness. His statement was that he attended to the administration of the estate of the late Mr. Charles L. Dubois in the capacity of Swiss Consul-General. The management was carried out in accordance with the Swiss Civil Code.

Mr. James Favre-Brandt was called as a witness, but Defendant's counsel offered an objection and said that this gentleman was a relative of the plaintiff. Admitting the objection to be reasonable, the Court decided not to examine Mr. Favre-Brandt.

Referring to Arts. 284 and 310 of the Swiss Civil Code, Plaintiff's Counsel repeated the statement given at the previous hearing that the parental rights of Mrs. Julia Dubois, the defendant, over her children should be annulled.

After a brief discussion the plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court to adjourn the case for further preparation of evidence. The Court adjourned the hearing till Feb. 23rd.

NEARY v. GEORGE.

The hearing of the case instituted by Mr. J. Neary, No. 185, claiming sixty-seven yen and twenty-one sen from Mrs. George, No. 106, was resumed on Feb. 19th in the Yokohama Local Court before Judge Aoyagi. After hearing further evidence the case was adjourned.

PETITION FOR DECISION IN BANKRUPTCY.

An action instituted by Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co., No. 27, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, asking for a decision in bankruptcy against R. Okawa, Sumiyoshi-cho, came up on Feb. 20th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nakanishi.

Plaintiffs were represented by Mr. Nakamura and the defendant by Mr. Yamada.

At the outset of the hearing, plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court to give a decision in bankruptcy against the defendant. Subsequently Counsel stated the cause of the petition. (1) The plaintiffs made a contract on Oct. 5th, 1905, with defendant to purchase iodoform from the latter and paid yen 4,500 as bargain money. As the Japanese trader did not deliver the iodoform on the due date the parties agreed to cancel the contract and the Japanese promised to pay back to the plaintiffs the bargain money not later than January 21st this year, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. (2) On Nov. 1st last, Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co., made a contract with the defendant to purchase from the latter 2,250 kin of crystallized peppermint and 2,350 kin of peppermint oil, costing yen 16,875, on condition that the drug should be delivered in January this year. At the same time, plaintiffs advanced yen 13,500 to the defendant. The plaintiffs also made a contract (3) on Nov. 25th last with the defendant to purchase 3,250 kin of crystallized peppermint and 2,250 kin of peppermint oil, costing yen 16,650 in all. The due day of delivery was to be Jan. 20th this year, upon which promise plaintiff advanced yen 13,500 to defendant. Finally (4) on Dec. 16th last, the plaintiffs concluded a contract with him for the purchase of two thousand pounds of crude iodine costing yen 10,400 on condition that the drug should be delivered during a period extending from December to the end of January this year. With a view to facilitating the transaction, plaintiffs advanced to the defendant yen 6,000 on Dec. 26th and yen 2,000 on the 29th of the same month. Beside the foregoing contracts, the plaintiffs lent yen 12,600 last year to the defendant. These various amounts make a total of yen 52,100 in all. The defendant delivered 2,250 kin of crystallized peppermint, costing yen 11,250, on No. 3 contract, and 1,000 lbs. of iodine, valued at yen 4,732, on No. 4 contract. Since then the defendant has not delivered any further quantities of the drug as contracted for nor has he paid back the money advanced—the balance being yen 36,118. Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co. have urged him often to settle the account by delivering the goods or by paying back the advances, and finally the Japanese trader wrote a letter saying that he had sustained severe losses in business and could not carry out any more of the various contracts. The letter added that the plaintiffs might take any steps they liked against him as he was unable to settle his accounts. Plaintiffs accordingly seized the property of the defendant, when they found that the estimated value of the property attached was only about sixteen hundred yen against advances of yen 36,118. Under this circumstance, a petition for a decision in bankruptcy against the defendant was unavoidable.

Defendant's Counsel briefly stated that according to the provisions of the Commercial Code, bankruptcy can not be declared unless suspension of payments has been declared. He contended that the action of the plaintiffs was unreasonable. Referring to the first contract, Counsel said that the Japanese trader never did make such a promise to Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co.

Plaintiffs' Counsel produced contracts, receipts for the money advanced, and the letter above referred to.

Defendant's Counsel said that his client was absent in Okayama, Bingo province, at the time when the letter produced in Court was supposed to have been written in Yokohama by the defendant. Counsel produced a telegram which the defendant sent to his family, the date corresponding with the letter in dispute. The message, however, did not bear the name of the sender. Plaintiff's Counsel refused to admit this message, whereupon the defendant's Counsel asked the Court to make enquiry at the Okayama Telegraph Office in order to ascertain who the sender of the message was. The Court consented to the request.

As to the Power-of-Attorney of the defendant's Counsel, plaintiffs' Counsel said that the seal affixed to the document was not the same as that attached to the various contracts given to Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co. by him in the drug transactions. Defendant's Counsel asked the Court to summon an expert to examine both seals. The Court also consented to this request.

The Court then rose, adjourning the hearing till March 6th.

TRIUMPHAL CELEBRATION IN TOKYO.

Some five thousand officers and soldiers belonging principally to the First Division and the Imperial Guards were entertained by Tokyo citizens on Feb. 16th in Hibiya Park. This was the second occasion on which the city has welcomed home the heroes of the late war, the first party being held last year at Uyeno. Despite the cold, the affair passed off most successfully, the sun shining forth all the time from unclouded skies. The troops left their barracks at 8 a.m. on Friday and marched to Uyeno Park separately. They assembled at Shinobazu before 10 a.m., where a large extent of ground was enclosed with white and red cotton cloth. Over the entrance to the ground was erected an arch ornamented with evergreens and artificial flowers. In the enclosure, the usual decorations, bunting, etc., were arranged. After a two hours' rest, refreshments were served and then the troops marched out under the leadership of Prince Kan-in. The procession advanced through the main streets of the urban divisions, Shitaya, Kanda, Nihonbashi and Kyobashi; and turning to the right at Shimbashi eventually reached Hibiya Park. The streets, through which the troops marched were decorated with flags and lanterns, while the footways and every available standing place were crowded with myriads of citizens. The order of the procession was as follows: police guard; military band; General Baron Ou, Commander of the Second Army, and staff; General Baron Nogi, Commander of the Third Army, and staff; Field-Marshal Count Nodzu, Commander of the Central Army, and staff; General Kawamura, Commander of the Yalu Army (extreme left wing) and staff; Lieut-General Prince Kan-in, Commander of the Cavalry Corps, now Commander of the First Division, and staff; the headquarters of the first brigade of infantry; first regiment of infantry (1,800 men); the headquarters of the second brigade of infantry; the third regiment of infantry (1,800 men); the first regiment of cavalry (350 men); first regiment of artillery (130 men and eighteen guns captured from the Russians); first battalion of pioneers (370 engineers); first battalion of commissariat, several squadrons of machine-guns, medical officers and nurses belonging to the field-hospitals, etc. On arriving at the park the officers were conducted to a large tent for a rest while the men were drawn up in lines in front of the pavilion where the ceremony of welcome took place.

A triumphal arch—eight ken in height and seven and a half ken in width—was built at the entrance to the garden, the plan being similar to the arch in front of Shimbashi Railway station. On the upper part were three characters, Gaisenwo-shukusu, "congratulatory triumph" worked with chrysanthemums.

At 1.40 p.m. the ceremonies began. Baron Shibusawa representing the citizens of Tokyo, read the following address:—

"Your Excellencies, the Commander-in-Chief of the Manchurian Armies, the other honoured officers, and soldiers, who participated in the Japan-Russian war! We, the committee appointed to welcome you on behalf of the Tokyo citizens, have the great honour of holding a second ceremony of welcome to-day. At the outbreak of the war, you proceeded to the front and since then you have carried out successfully many battles, though surrounded by innumerable difficulties. You defeated the vigilance of the enemy's armies and overthrew his strongholds, and at length such victories were achieved as find few parallels in history. The Japanese military and national reputation has been further enhanced through your patriotic and self-sacrificing devotion to our country.

"Now your Excellencies, Commander-in-Chief! You have returned from the front in triumph accompanying your brave men and you have presented to His Majesty the Emperor reports concerning the war. At this opportunity we the Tokyo citizens emphatically welcome you and thank you for the excellent services you have rendered to our country."

ralissimo, and with the profound sympathy of our countrymen, we carried out the war successfully, though we are conscious of our slight merits. Our success must be attributed to the virtues of His Majesty and to the earnest co-operation of our countrymen. Now that the Tokyo citizens have held this grand welcoming party and have celebrated our triumph, I, Nodzu Michisane, have pleasure in returning profound thanks on behalf of the officers and men of the armies."

The military bands then struck up the National Anthem after which being led by Baron Senge, Governor of Tokyo-Fu, one of the Committee, enthusiastic banzai were thrice given for the Emperor and for the army.

The ceremonies concluded, the officers were entertained in different pavilions and tents, but the soldiers returned to their barracks where they were entertained with refreshments presented by the Tokyo Municipality.

After lunch various entertainments were provided, among them being the juggler Tenichi. About one thousand guests were present, together with some three hundred notables, including the foreign representatives and their staffs.

The party dispersed at 5 p.m.

THE FAMINE.

The Osaka Mainichi prints a telegram received from Washington which give the text of a message sent by the Emperor of Japan to the President of the United States. The message runs:—

The Government of the Japanese Empire expresses the heartiest thanks to the President of the United States for his kind sympathy with the sufferers in the famine-stricken districts in North-Eastern Japan. The Japanese Government earnestly assures the President that the whole nation recognises his action as another proof of the constant friendly solicitude of the President for the welfare of the people of a country which is connected by close ties with the United States. The Japanese Government desires to convey to the President the universal satisfaction felt by the Japanese nation."

Bishop M. C. Harris writes:—Recently I visited Sendai and carefully inquired into the conditions of the sufferers—their numbers, etc.—and I met the Committee of Relief. The appeals from this Committee published in the foreign journals are founded on well-ascertained facts and are deserving of entire confidence. It is a matter of congratulation that the foreign residents of these three Provinces foresaw calamity and acted with promptness in proffering relief themselves, and in issuing stirring appeals. Owing to this fact much suffering has been prevented and lives saved. The local Governors, Mayors and Heads of towns in terms most cordial expressed their appreciation for the timely relief afforded.

The method of distribution through the authorities is the very best; they have made full investigation of places and families needing help, and these are on record. All the money contributed through this Committee is certain to reach the needy, and not a cent is deducted for expenses. The Committee is international and non-sectarian, and does no religious work as such; only seeks to give aid to those who are destitute.

The machinery is now in motion that will afford relief throughout the afflicted districts, but money is insufficient. Millions of yen must be expended to feed, clothe and carry the million and more destitute people until harvests can be gathered.

The local assemblies and the people have acted vigorously in devising ways and means to meet the present and future distress. As already said, the appeals issued by the Committee of Relief and published in the foreign journals in Japan, are based on well-ascertained facts, and do not exaggerate in the least and only fail in making real the wide extent and acuteness of the misery which obtains. The generosity shown by the foreign residents of Japan is deeply appreciated by the sufferers themselves and the people of Japan, and testifies eloquently to the development of humane feeling among all peoples.

LITTLE ACTS OF KINDNESS.

[BY WILL PATTILLO.]

One spring day in the year 1887 an old American gentleman with white hair and a kindly and quiet mien was sitting on the matted floor, Japanese fashion, in a little steamer going up the famous Inland Sea from Hiroshima to Kobe. In those days foreigners could not travel in Japan outside the open ports, consequently they were not often seen in the little coast-wise steamers or on the country roads. They were looked upon with a good deal of suspicion, and everybody wondered what their real purpose could be in going up and down the country in unbeaten tracks. On this occasion this quiet old man from America had his big lunch basket with him as usual. In this he carried a knife, fork, spoons, cups, bread, salt, sugar, some tin meats, butter, ground coffee, and a small coffee pot. There were no staterooms or berths on these little boats but all the passengers of a given class entered one and the same room and occupied a small space on the floor. With him in the same room squatting around or lying down were a number of Japanese men and women, young and old. When the foreigner began to prepare his lunch all eyes were immediately turned to what he was doing and to find out if possible what these strangers eat and drink. After he had made a pot full of coffee and had toasted several pieces of bread over the burning charcoals in the brazier, he called for some of those tiny Japanese tea cups, poured out a sip of coffee for each of his fellow passengers, at the same time passing around a small piece of toasted bread to each one. To most of them this was the first time they had ever seen or tasted either and so of course it was interesting if not good.

Among the passengers there was one person at least upon whom this little act of kindness of the stranger from across the seas made a deep and lasting impression. He was a young man, hardly out of his teens, a little different from the average Nipponese in that his forehead was higher, his eyes rounder and his cheeks more ruddy. Like most Japanese he had always thought of foreigners as brusque, rather over-hearing, and not taking time or trouble to do such small acts of kindness. This passing around of toast and coffee by the old man to absolute strangers and to people of a different race, language and religion, was an interesting revelation to this young Japanese school boy. When the boat reached Kobe the passengers landed and the young man went away with new thoughts and a new picture in his mind.

Not long after this the old man went to Hiroshima again and it was advertised that he was to preach in an open chapel that night. The young man had also returned to Hiroshima and one of his friends called by and suggested that they go to the chapel and hear what the foreigner was going to do and say. They went and the young man from the boat recognized the preacher as his former fellow passenger from whom he had received toast and coffee. After services were over he went up by invitation and shook hands with the old missionary, and this time he felt the cordial hand grasp and saw the kindness in his face at close range and received a pressing invitation to come again. From that time the young man set his head and heart to study Christianity to see if there was not something really good in the religion that could make a white haired old man live the life and do the work this one was so quietly doing. The young man had had his heart set on being a soldier with visions of battles and honors in promotion to rank. But that sip of coffee in the boat was a turning point in his life and now, he is one of the best qualified and most successful Christian pastors in Japan while the old missionary has gone to his eternal rest.

THE SHALLARD-PAGE WEDDING.

The marriage of Mr. Harold Wentworth Dillon Shallard, of the P. & O. S. N. Co. Shanghai (son of Capt. Shallard of Roscommon, Ireland) and Miss Adelaide Edith Page, second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Finch Page, of Togonohama, Dzusai, was celebrated in Yokohama on Saturday. The civil ceremony took place at the British Consulate-General before the Consul-General, Mr. John Carey Hall, I.S.O., and later in the Union Church the usual church service was conducted by Rev. E. S. Booth. The service was fully choral and Mr. W. Karl Vincent was at the organ, the fine solo from "Ruth," "Entreat me not to leave thee," being rendered by Miss Mendelson.

The bride, who entered the church on the arm of her father, was dressed in rich ivory satin with full skirt, and draped waist, trimmed with fichu of blonde lace fastened with a long trail of orange blossoms, and wore a tulle veil with a wreath of orange blossoms.

She was attended during the ceremony by her sisters, Miss Helena Page, as maid of honour, and Misses Gertrude, Dorothy and Hilda Page as bridesmaids, and they wore white serge costumes trimmed with gold braid and hats of chiffon velvet trimmed with gold buckles and chiffon.

The maid of honour and the bridesmaids wore gold dragon brooches set with pearls, which were the gift of the bridegroom.

Mrs. Page, mother of the bride, wore grey amazon cloth trimmed with grey velvet and grey Hungarian lace and a hat of black chiffon. Mrs. Buckland, sister of the bride, was attired in tan drap d'été trimmed with pleated taffeta and guipure lace, and wore a picture hat of velvet.

Handsome bouquets were carried by the bridal party, the bride having a shower bouquet of pure white flowers and her sisters white bouquets picked out with yellow. Mrs. Page and Mrs. Buckland carried bouquets of violets and heliotrope.

Mr. L. S. Hudson acted as best man and Messrs. R. C. Edwards, H. A. Poole and W. M. Squire as groomsmen while Messrs. F. Booth and M. Mendelson officiated as ushers.

A reception held in the afternoon at No. 62 Bluff was very largely attended, and the presents, which were very handsome and valuable, were on view.

In the evening the newly wedded couple left for Miyanoshta where they will spend the honeymoon.

The bride's going-away dress was of biscuit coloured cloth and coat to match, trimmed with dark brown braid with touches of orange panne in vest and collar. Her hat was of brown taffeta with plume.

DEATH OF MR. H. Z. WHEELER.

We announce with deep regret the death of Mr. Horace Z. Wheeler, a resident whose personality was known to most American members of the community and to many others of various nationalities. Mr. Wheeler, who was over 80 years of age, was born in New London, Connecticut, and came out to California in the early fifties. After engaging in business for some time he joined the local customs service and for 19 years was an official of that branch of the Government. He was then appointed to a post in the Imperial Japanese Customs at Yokohama, where he gave for twelve years greatly appreciated service, which was recognized by an Imperial Japanese decoration.

Mr. Wheeler had been in failing health for some time but his death at 11 a.m. on Wednesday, in his residence, No. 2322 Negishi (Yokohama), was somewhat of a surprise to his friends.

The deceased gentleman leaves a son, resident in Los Angeles, another in San Francisco, and a daughter who is now resident in Chefoo. Mr. Wheeler enjoyed the society of a large number of friends who will deeply regret his passing away.

Two men armed with swords, broke into the house of T. Ikami, a pawn broker, Nakamura-

A serious accident took place in Ura-machi, Kobe, between 8 and 9 p.m. on the 10th inst. Night work was proceeding in the trenches that are being excavated in Ura-machi, where water pipes are being laid, when three of the men in the trench were suddenly overwhelmed by a fall of earth. It appears that the trench, which is about five feet deep, was wider at the bottom than the top, so that a subsidence was not surprising. How the men came to be entombed is not clear, says a Kobe contemporary, but two were rescued after twenty minutes work and sent to hospital. The third man, unfortunately, could not be rescued in time, and he was found to be dead when his body was extricated.

The following cable has been placed at our disposal:—

San Francisco, February 1.

Marichien is now ashore at Chicagof Island, Alaska. December 25 was flooded with water which put out the fires, drifted one month. Gibbs will leave to-night.

The Marichien was loaded at San Francisco and Seattle for Vladivostok with a cargo valued at about $175,000 (gold). She sailed in December. Gibbs, mentioned in the cable, is the surveyor and wrecking-master of the San Francisco Board of Marine Underwriters located at Seattle, and is a very capable man. The insurance of the vessel, freight and cargo was handled by the agents of the North China Insurance Co., Ltd.

An insurance aggregating £237,000, in connection with the new Japanese battleship Kashima, has come on the insurance market, says the L. & C. Express. It is for the armament now under construction in the Elswick Works by Messrs. Armstrong, and takes effect until the battleship is finished and delivered in the Tyne to the agents of the Japanese Government. The present insurance contract is supplemental to the large amount which was placed on the hull, machinery, and engines of the vessel also building by Armstrongs, and was effected in their name and that of the Japanese Minister in London jointly. All the policies are concurrent, and expire simultaneously, and those which refer to the armament include not only fire and risks incidental to trial trips to sea prior to the official delivery of the vessel, but also the lifting on board and fixing of the heavy material, as well as the transit of the same from the constructors' works to the battleship. Permission is further given to fire the guns at sea when the vessel is finished in connection with her trial trips, but underwriters are exempted from liability for loss of life or personal injury.

Writing on January 12, a Paris correspondent says:—Prince Henry of Battenberg and Princess Ena have arrived at Biarritz. The King of Spain has been a constant visitor since their arrival. There is a slight hitch with regard to the marriage as Cardinal Merry de Val requires that the Princess should be "received" into the Church of Rome by the Pope with a public ceremony. The English papers are very indignant that the Princess should be treated as though she were a pagan. They say that King Edward ought to insist, either that the Princess should be accepted as an Anglican Catholic, having, as in the case of the Queen of Charles I., her own Chapel and Chaplains for the English rite, or that she should be received on confessing her belief in the dogmas distinctly Roman which supplement the Anglican faith. Another account says:—The Vatican has been informed that Princess Ena of Battenberg, who is to marry King Alfonso of Spain, will formally adopt the Catholic faith in a short time, and that the ceremony of her adoption into the church will take place at Lourdes. Her visit to Rome has been postponed until after the formal announcement of the betrothal is made. It is understood that the Spanish Ambassador at the Vatican has already officially notified the Pope.

AMERICAN TOPICS.

The terminal structure in Manhattan of the Hudson Company's tunnel will be the largest skyscraper in the world, consisting of twin buildings, each twenty-three stories high, with a terminal station in the basement. One building will cover a lot 38,500 square feet and the area of the other building will be 23,500 square feet. Together they will inclose not less than 16,000,000 cubic feet of space.

Dr. John Alexander Dowie's reign is over. The pressing creditors of Zion City were informed on Jan. 17 by a representative of the "triumvirate" of deacons which has had charge of Zion's affairs since Dr. Dowie's departure for Jamaica that the old leader had abdicated completely the financial control of that community, and that a new era of "Gentile" factories and industries is to be ushered in.

The New York Sun thinks that the business of building apartment and tenement houses has been overdone in Greater New York. New apartments to the number of 77,285 were provided last year, and 39,875 the year preceding. This seems out of all proportion to the growth of population, for estimating a single family to the apartment, the additions of 1905 would furnish quarters for over 300,000 people. New York is growing pretty fast, but it is not expanding at any such rate, and unless a halt is called there is likely to be trouble.

The American Senate on Jan. 30 passed the bill providing for the reorganization of the consular service, practically without discussion. It makes many changes, among which are the following: It provides for the classification of consulates in grades; gives the President authority to transfer officers from one station to another; provides an inspection service with five inspectors, who are to rank as consuls-general; requires that clerks at consulates shall be Americans; prohibits consuls from engaging in law practice; and requires that all consular fees shall be accounted for.

The will of the late Marshall Field was filed for probate on Jan. 24. Specific bequests are made to the aggregate of $25,568,000. The remainder of the estate is left in trust for the son, Marshall Field Jr. (died November 27th) and his descendants. The principal of the residuary estate is to be kept intact until one of the sons of Marshall Field shall reach the age of 50 years. The largest single bequest is for $8,000,000, to be used as an endowment and building fund for the Field Columbian Museum. The widow is given $1,000,000 and to the daughter, Mrs. Beattie of Leamington, England, $4,400,000 is left in trust.

Club life in the city of Lafayette (Ind.), has received a severe blow by a decision of the Three o'clock Club, which is composed largely of the wives of Purdue University professors, that club life is inimical to the home and resulting in a motion to dissolve the club. The Three o'clock Club was to debate the question: "Resolved. That club life is beneficial to the home," and three ladies were selected for each side. Those who took the negative were so positive in their arguments that club life is becoming too engrossing, and is thus interfering with the home duties that many ladies who had held opposite views were apparently convinced, and they joined in the suggestion that the club disband.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller again has opened his purse strings to the University of Chicago. The latest of the benefactions which the oil king has bestowed upon the Midway university in the seventeen years he has upheld its financial welfare is a gift of $1,450,000. This donation was announced at a special meeting of the university board of trustees. The sum includes $1,000,000 for the permanent endowment, $335,500 to cover current expenditures or the deficit of various departments upon July 1, 1907, and $100,000, the interest of which is to go to Mrs. W. Rainey Harper during her lifetime. General satisfaction is expressed over Rockefeller's provisions for Mrs. Harper. In addition to the income from this $100,000 she will have the interest from $50,000 which was given outright to President Harper and herself six years ago by Rockefeller. This gift has not been made public. She will receive $50,000 life insurance and half of Dr. Harper's annual salary, amounting to $8,500, which the trustees recently voted her. The last large donation of Rockefeller to the university was given December 22, 1903, when $1,967,921, including three distinct gifts, was announced. Since that time he had given but $400,000 up to the present year.

The total dividends disbursed by the Cripple Creek companies to January 1st aggregate $25,000,000, of which sum $3,847,690 is credited to 1905. The greater part of this was from profits of mining. Perhaps $5,000,000 will cover dividends resulting from sales, both cash and stock. To this amount should be added the profits of individual mine owners, leasing firms and close corporations. W. S. Stratton alone realized $4,500,000 from his Independence mine before he sold it to its present English owners. Probably $200,000,000 would be a fair estimate of the profits not counted as dividends. This would make a grand total of $45,000,000 dividends realized from the total product of $203,395,150 gross.

For the first time in years there are no vessels on Puget Sound awaiting charters. Last year nearly every Sound port had vessels tied up awaiting more prosperous times in shipping. The revival in the lumber trade, together with the large wheat crop, have created a demand for every windjammer that the Sound shippers have been able to secure. During the last three years the number of ships loaded at Sound ports has increased 70 per cent. During the next thirty days eight sailing vessels, now loading at Tacoma, Port Blakeley, Port Gamble and Ballard, will carry to foreign ports over 12,000,000 feet of lumber. Shipping men say that during the past month there has been a greater demand for lumber charters than ever.

By the will of Andrew J. Dotger of South Orange, N.J., the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute will eventually receive a bequest that promises to be the largest in its history. At the death of the testator's wife, Clara L. Dotger, the entire residuary estate, said to be about $500,000, will go to the endowment fund of Booker T. Washington's negro school. The present endowment is a little over $1,000,000. The will containing the bequest has just been filed for probate in Newark, N.J. Dotger died December 30th. He retired from the New York Stock Exchange thirty years ago, and has since been interested mostly in the local affairs of the Oranges. He had no connection with Tuskegee and never visited it, but he read much about the negro problem and the Tuskegee way of solving it. He was born in Philadelphia in 1841.

Commodore William Penn McCann has died at his home in New Rochelle. He was born in Paris, Ky., seventy-six years ago. He entered the American Navy when 18 years of age, and was in active service for forty-four years, being retired in 1892. During the Civil War, he was a Lieutenant-Commander and was in temporary command of the gunboat Marata at the siege of Yorktown. He captured the Confederate gunboat Traser with the plans of the defence of Richmond on board. Later he commanded five gunboats during the siege of Washington, N. C., and the Kennebec at Mobile bay. After the war he was made a Commander, in 1876 a Captain, and Commodore in 1887. In 1891, during the Chilean revolution, he captured the insurgent steamer Itala and sent her back to San Diego, Cal.

All the American papers deplore the loss which Chicago University sustained by the death of Dr. Harper. They point out that from the first endowment of $600,000 the university has accumulated, through his industry $18,000,000 within a period of fifteen years; is outranked in wealth by only four American institutions—Harvard, Yale, Girard College and Leland Stanford—and is the peer of them all in equipment and scope. Fourteen million dollars have been given by John D. Rockefeller alone in the accumulation and support of this vast property. President Harper's appetite for work was insatiable, and his powers of endurance apparently unlimited. His time was governed by an iron routine, which was carried out each day with machine-like infallibility. His field of activities was far wider than that of other presidents of great universities. While supervising every detail in the administration of the university, he also devoted himself assiduously to scholarly tasks, taught classes in the divinity school, edited classics, conducted philological research, made investigations in advanced Biblical criticism, and published and contributed to a score of learned magazines. But even these duties, with the toil of constantly seeking for contributions to help him work out the plans he had formed for the university evolution, were not enough to keep him moderately busy. He was prominent in undergraduate affairs, talked to the students frequently, in mass meetings and in private consultation, and was a leading figure at the official social functions of the university, which were numerous. In appearance he was unprepossessing and unacademic. There was more of the lawyer or the man of affairs, than of the pedagogue in his face, which was round and full. Nose, mouth and chin, each denoting inflexible resolution, were flanked by ample, sallow cheeks. Gold-rimmed glasses, always helped his dark-brown, piercing eyes—the only touch of the student which a casual observer would find. His figure was short, plump and ungraceful; his manner alert and decided.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOME POSTAL REFORMS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE JAPAN MAIL.)

SIR,—As soon as I read a note in the Japan Mail concerning the comparatively high rate of interest (5.4 per cent.) allowed by the Postal Savings Bank, I became a depositor, and I think that many other foreigners would do so did they not labor under the impression that there are many vexatious rules and that a low rate of interest only is allowed. If notices were put in English at the various post-offices stating the facilities offered, depositors would doubtless be attracted.

In this connection I should like to be allowed to make a few suggestions that have occurred to me. When a deposit is made, after a few days, a notice is sent from the central office to the effect that the amount has been entered. This is well and good; but why should it be sent on a mere slip of paper that anyone can read? Some do not care to have their servants know what they deposit from time to time. Then why should the limit of deposit be one thousand yen? If more depositors are called for why not more money?

The use of picture post-cards must considerably increase the revenue of the Post Office Department, and it seems that the time has come when two concessions might be made to users of cards. In the first place, for domestic use, part of the address side of the card might be allowed, as it is in other countries, for use in writing the message. Such a concession would probably have no influence on the revenue. People would in some cases write the address in smaller, and the message in larger, letters than at present. In any case this seems an inevitable step in the development of the use of the post-card. A second very slight concession would be to alter that regulation which does not allow even a printed address to be pasted on the card. Unnecessary trouble is often given to the clerks who have to write the Japanese address by this regulation—or rather by its unnecessarily strict interpretation. "It is not common sense," said a Japanese friend of mine.

I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

VIDI.

YOKOHAMA CRICKET AND ATHLETIC CLUB.

Following is the Report to be presented at the Annual General Meeting of the Members of the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club to be held at the Cricket Pavilion on Friday, the 23rd February:—

The past year has been a busy one in all departments of sport with which the Club is concerned. Separate reports will be found detailed under the various headings.

The Club now consists of 291 members, 65 names having been added to the list during the year. Various changes have taken place in the personnel of the Committee, owing to transfer of residence, of which the following are the details.

Mr. W. L. Merriman, Captain of Baseball, vice Mr. L. E. McChesney.
Mr. W. D. S. Edwards, Ground, vice Mr. W. Y. Showler.
Mr. L. S. Hudson, Honorary Secretary, vice Mr. E. W. Kilby.
Mr. W. D. S. Edwards, Ground.
Mr. E. W. Maitland, Captain of Cricket.

The continuance of the war during the greater part of the year was again the cause of fewer "outside" matches being played, neither British nor American men-of-war having been much in evidence.

General interest in the Club has been fairly well maintained, but it is desirable that the younger members of the Club should, by their full support in all directions, assist the Committee to keep this interest alive.

The Ground has again been lent to the Junior Athletic Club and to the Ladies' Hockey Club.

ACCOUNTS:—A reference to the Abstract included in this Report will show the financial position of the Club, which your Committee considers eminently satisfactory, the balance at debit of the Club having been reduced by nearly yen 1,500.

The best thanks of the Members are due to Mrs. Dinsdale who generously placed at the disposal of the Club the net proceeds of the fourth performance of her exceedingly acceptable and witty musical extravaganza entitled "Sleeping Beauty," the result of that performance benefitting the Club to the extent of some yen 420.

Entrance fees have improved by yen 400 as compared with the previous year.

REPORT ON THE GROUND:—Owing to a good deal of wet weather during the last three months the ground has been somewhat cut up, more especially in the Rugby Interport Match. This will require the immediate attention of the incoming Committee, as will also the fence round the ground, which, having been removed in places for various celebrations during the year, will require to be largely renewed.

CRICKET:—The season was most successful, the interest in the game being keen and well-maintained throughout.

With over fifty active members it was impossible to meet the demand for Saturday afternoon play, and a certain amount of dissatisfaction was expressed; under existing arrangements there is no remedy for this.

Two matches were played against Tokyo, the Club winning on both occasions. We suffered defeat at the hands of the Navy, after a very good game, by 5 runs.

The Kobe Interport Match was played on the 9th and 10th October on the home ground and resulted in a win for our team by an innings and 247 runs. The batting of Dr. Moon, R.N., with a fine innings of 108 (the only century during the season) and all-round play of Dr. Emerson (61 runs and 6 wickets for 23) and J. T. Dixon (60 runs and 11 wickets for 51) were the features of the game.

J. M. Mollison heads the batting and Dr. Moon the bowling averages. The latter is not likely to be with us next season and he will be much missed, having always taken the keenest interest in the game.

BASEBALL:—A great deal of interest was shown in this sport during the past season and a number of interesting club games were played. The team was most unfortunate in losing its captain and one of its best players.

Mr. McChesney left in the middle of the season for Kobe, thus weakening the team, from which it never recovered.

The annual interport games with Kobe were played here and as was expected proved an easy victory for Kobe.

Yokohama will have to look to its laurels this coming season both in the Box and at the Bat. There is a splendid opportunity for some of the younger members to cover themselves with glory by coming forward and learning how to pitch good Ball, while all the players can improve their batting.

A very handsome cup was offered by Mr. de Cuers to stimulate the batting in the Interport Games and was won by the veteran of the nine.

Prizes were also given by Mr. D. H. Blake for best infield play and by Mr. E. V. Thorn for best Batting average during the season.

The former was won by Mr. Murray Mollison and latter by Mr. C. H. Thorn.

With the exception of new balls (which will have to be ordered soon) the Base Ball gear is in good condition for the coming season.

RUGBY FOOTBALL:—Very considerable interest has been taken in this game and during the season several interesting games have been played, notably "Born in Japan" v. "The World."

The annual interport contest versus the K.R. & A.C. took place on our grounds on the 10th February. Unfortunately owing to a heavy snowfall on the previous day the ground was in a bad state and rather marred the game, which, however, was keenly contested, resulting in a win for our club, for the fourth year in succession, by 2 tries (6 points) to 1 try (3 points).

Dr. Moon's assistance as referee throughout the season has been very highly appreciated by everyone.

ASSOCIATION FOOTBALL:—There has been considerable interest shown in this game during the season under review and the practice games have been well attended.

A team from the Diadem was met early in the season, which resulted in a loss to the Home XI by 6 goals to 3.

The Ground has been lent to the Boys' Brigade on several occasions to play teams from the French school and also the Tokyo Higher Normal School, in which games much interest was taken and the play of several young members of the Y.C. & A.C. keenly watched. The Annual Match v. the K.R. & A.C. has been fixed for the 10th March. The Six-Aside games have helped to pull men into fair condition and have improved play somewhat. Owing to the time required by the Rugby men towards the date of the Interport Match the 6's have been allowed to drop for the time, but it is hoped that same will be taken up with energy during the next week.

LAWN TENNIS:—The courts were used largely by the members during the past season, and the usual competitions were held.

The Singles Championship was won for the second year in succession by Mr. T. J. Chapman, who thus becomes the possessor of the Challenge Cup presented by the late Mr. David Jackson, the conditions of the Cup being that it had to be won twice in succession or three times altogether to become the absolute property of the winner.

The Singles Handicap and Doubles Handicap Competitions were won by Mr. A. W. Read and Messrs. A. W. Read and H. W. Kilby respectively.

ATHLETICS:—The annual athletic meeting meeting was held on Saturday, 20th May. The entries were more numerous than usual and all events were closely contested. The ground proved too heavy for record breaking, owing to the previous day's rain, but W. B. Mason covered the quarter mile in 53½ (club record 53½), a good performance on the heavy ground.

THE FRENCH PRESIDENT.

M. Fallieres, who on Sunday formally took office, was elected President of France on the first ballot in the National Assembly on January 17th. The vote was: M. Fallieres 449, M. Doumer, 371. The National Assembly met at 1 o'clock in the Congress hall of the royal palace at Versailles for the election. The assembly consists nominally of 591 Deputies and 300 Senators, but owing to deaths, illness and the passage of some of the Deputies to the Senate, leaving their seats vacant, the number present was decreased to about 860, making 430 votes necessary to elect a new President.

The greatest interest was manifested in the proceedings, which, however, were very prolonged. The members of the Assembly voted in alphabetical order. Those awaiting their turn discussed excitedly the prospects of their favourites. Although several candidates were mentioned for the Presidency in succession to M. Loubet, including M. Fallieres, President of the Senate; M. Doumer, President of the Chamber of Deputies; M. Sarrieu, former Minister of Justice, and M. Leon Bourgeois, the former Premier, the real contest was between Fallieres and Doumer. M. Fallieres had the general support of the advanced Socialist and Radical groups, constituting the famous party which sustained the Combes Ministry. Doumer, however, was a formidable opponent, whose election to the Presidency of the Chamber of Deputies last year, after breaking away from his former connection with the famous party previously referred to, gave the first blow to M. Combes.

The old Liberal Republicans belonging to the Centre and the Conservatives who then voted for Doumer, still seemed inclined to continue their allegiance.

Then when the first figures were given out there was an outburst of enthusiasm, which was renewed after the corrected figures, giving M. Fallieres 449 and thus increasing his already clear majority, were announced. One voter abstained from voting.

Fallieres returned to Paris from Versailles, escorted by a military guard of honour.

MEANS PEACE IN EUROPE.

The election of M. Fallieres means much in French and European politics at this critical moment. It means that Clemenceau for the third time, has named the President of the French republic. It means as much as any selection could mean—peace in France and peace in Europe. It means the re-establishment of the republican bloc, which it was supposed was finally dissolved. The election of Doumer, who is a stormy petrel in French politics, would have brought apprehension throughout Europe. His abilities are greater than Fallieres, but his strong radicalism would have been regarded as a menace to peace in the pending crisis with Germany, which may prove a severe test to French patience.

The need of France at the present moment is not a strong man, so much as one of infinite tact and restraint. These qualities Fallieres possesses, as well as abundant patriotism. Foreign intrigues against France will be powerless so long as the chief of state has the benefit of the supreme abilities of Clemenceau, the lion of French politics, who for the past fourteen years has been almost without power, but who is now again in a position to dominate in certain respects the destinies of the country. For fully fifteen years previous to 1892 Clemenceau made and unmade Ministers and Presidents. Now his regained influence will be used for constructive, not destructive purposes as formerly. He alone among the French publicists during the past year fully understood the German intrigues against France and he may be depended upon to suggest effective moves for fresh manoeuvres.

CAREER OF NEW PRESIDENT.

The new President of France is a son of a magistrate's clerk and the grandson of a blacksmith. M. Clement Armand Fallieres was born November 6th, 1841, at Mazin, Department of Lot-et-Garonne. He studied law and was called to the bar at Merc, of which town he became Mayor, retaining the office until 1875. In the following year he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies as a Republican and affiliated himself with the Republican left group in the Chamber. He distinguished himself as an orator and was re-elected in 1877 and 1878. In 1880 he was named as Under Secretary to the Minister of the Interior, and he was again re-elected to the Assembly in 1881. He retired from the Ministry at the time of the fall of the Jules Ferry Cabinet, but returned to power the following year and was made President of the Council and made an interim Minister of Foreign Affairs. Subsequently he was successively Minister of Public Instruction, Minister of the Interior and Minister of Justice. He was elected Senator in 1890, a position which he has held since that time, and was elected to the presidency of the Senate in 1899. He was re-elected in 1900 and was re-elected January 11th of the present year.

M. Fallieres took an active part in the religious question, opposing at first the proposition for the separation of the church and state, but later energetically advocated the repression of the clergy.

M. Fallieres is noted for his devotion to simple country life. Whenever opportunity offers he returns to his birthplace, Mezin, the home of his ancestors through hundreds of years.

In his youth the President-elect apparently gave no indication of capacity for a brilliant future, and it is even said that in his school days he was somewhat indolent. However, he succeeded in taking degrees in letters and in the sciences, and as a student at law passed creditable examinations. After concluding his terms as a law student, M. Fallieres returned home and for some time seemed to justify the prediction of his father that he would not be successful in his career. However, he plunged into his work, became a close student, soon obtained official appointments, entered politics and made that rapid progress which has just resulted in his selection as President of the French republic.

Although M. Fallieres still owns the house in Mezin in which he was born, he no longer makes it his residence, but when in the country lives at Loupillon, near Mezin, where he cultivates extensive vineyards, to which he gives a great amount of time and study. He is greatly respected by the public and by the neighbourhood of his modest country mansion, and it is announced his charity is limited only by his finances, which are not believed to be large.

FRANCE AND VENEZUELA.

Willemstadt, Curacao, January 17.

France, on January 10th, broke off diplomatic relations with Venezuela through the American Minister at Caracas, Mr. Russell, who, at present, is in charge of French interests.

M. Taigny, the retiring French Chargé d'Affaires, who left La Guayra on January 15th, on the French steamer Martinique for Curacao, arrived here to-day and is waiting for a French cruiser to convey him to Martinique.

The chiefs of the French cable offices at Caracas and La Guayra, M. Jaccoux and M. Bourgate, have been expelled from Venezuela.

Cable communication with Martinique continues interrupted.

Willemstadt, Island of Curacao, Dutch West Indies, Jan. 17.—The following facts were given to the Associated Press by M. Taigny to-day:

Knowing that the Captain of the Martinique had important despatches for him and being without advice for five days, owing to the closing of the cable, M. Taigny went to La Guayra on Saturday 1st, accompanied by the French Vice-Consul. He was accustomed to board the French steamer without a permit, which, on this occasion he was not allowed to do. Thinking it his duty under the circumstances he decided to go aboard the Martinique without permission. On Sunday the Vice-Consul and the Cable Directors accompanied M. Taigny to the wharf, but did not persist in going on board the Martinique with him. The Venezuelans, however, it was noticed, went on board the vessel, and returned without being in any way hindered.

While conversing with the Captain of the Martinique, a policeman ordered M. Taigny to leave the vessel, but he refused to do so. While breakfasting an order came to the Captain of the vessel to put out 20 metres from the shore, which was done, and nobody was allowed to leave the ship.

M. Taigny asked permission of the Customs officer to go ashore with him, but this was denied, and when he insisted on going ashore, force was used to prevent him.

At 5 o'clock M. Taigny was officially notified that if he went ashore he would be imprisoned.

Sunday evening passed with a Venezuelan guard watching for any movement M. Taigny might make.

Meanwhile the French Vice-Consul went to Caracas and informed Mr. Russell, the American Minister, of the condition of affairs. Mr. Russell, though ill, at once took up the matter, and used every influence with President Castro, but without avail. The Vice-Consul brought to M. Taigny a letter from Mr. Russell to that effect. M. Taigny then sent a protest to Mr. Russell and to the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps.

At 11 o'clock the French steamer agent, with the authority of President Castro, informed M. Taigny that a French naval vessel would take him off at 4 o'clock in the morning. No such vessel came, however, and one day was lost in waiting. The Martinique then left for Porto Cabello, where M. Taigny was forbidden all communication with the shore. He then required the Captain of the Martinique to touch at Willemstadt, which was not on his schedule, and to leave him there.

Paris, January 21.

It appears to be certain that the French Government has resolved not to take action with regard to Venezuela until the full report of M. Taigny reaches the Foreign Office. This report is expected to come by way of Washington, where M. Taigny will turn it over to M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador.

The question of demanding an extraordinary credit is held in abeyance for the present. According to reliable information, Premier Rouvier did not see the necessity at present of using forcible means to obtain reparation for the insult to M. Taigny, and it is probable that he will mainly rely on the exercise of the influence of the United States with President Castro.

The desire to see in which direction the Moroccan Conference will turn also forms a factor, which restrains France from precipitately burdening herself with another difficult question, the solution of which is possible, and which might involve a delicate situation in connection with other Powers having dealings with the Venezuelan Government.

Washington, January 21.

Convinced of the sincerity of the assurances received from France regarding her loyalty to the Monroe Doctrine, the Washington Government has given the Paris Government a free hand in the execution of the programme for the solution of the Venezuelan problem. The conference on this phase of the question took place some time ago, and M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador, has assurances that the efforts of France to obtain diplomatic treatment for her representative at Caracas will not be interpreted at Washington as in any way violative of the Monroe Doctrine.

The first move in the execution of the French programme may be expected at any time, but on this point the French Government is observing the strictest secrecy, the orders to the squadron going direct from Paris, and not through the Embassy here.

M. Taigny, the retiring French Chargé, who, it is believed, is now at Curacao, will come to this country on his way home, and on his arrival at New York will find an invitation from the French Ambassador at Washington to spend several days here, in order that M. Jusserand, on whom the burden of an important phase of the Venezuelan negotiations naturally falls, may have the benefit of the facts about the situation. It is not unlikely that M. Taigny will also see Secretary Root.

The whereabouts of the French ships remains a mystery so far as the officials of the State Department and French Embassy are concerned it is said. It is assumed, however, that they are daily in touch with the Ministry of Marine at Paris, and are awaiting an opportune moment to take such action as their instructions may provide for.

Great interest is felt in diplomatic circles here about the exact nature of a sentence found objectionable in the note of President Castro to M. Taigny. This sentence in substance referred to the presentation of M. Taigny to the Venezuelan Government, and announced the complete severance of all relations until explanation was made of conduct described by President Castro as not customary among well-mannered nations.

Willemstadt, January 22.

Advices received here to-day say that the Dean of the Diplomatic Corps at Caracas, the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires, has conferred with Senor Ybarra, the Venezuelan Foreign Minister, on the incidents attending the embarkation of the former French Chargé d'Affaires, M. Taigny, on board the French steamer Martinique, off La Guayra, on January 13th. The Belgian official pointed out that the Diplomatic Corps considered M. Taigny to be a member of the corps until removed by his Government, and asked the Foreign Minister for an explanation of the position of Venezuela to the members of the corps. Senor Ybarra evaded the request of the Belgian representative and treated the Taigny incident lightly, remarking that M. Taigny had "allowed himself to be caught like a rat in a trap."

There is a great lack of news at Caracas. The people of Venezuela are entirely ignorant of the situation.

MR. BALFOUR'S ELECTION ADDRESS.

London, February 16.

In his election address Mr. Balfour said a detailed explanation of his views was not needed as his opinions were well known and recent events had made no change in them.

THE UNIONISTS.

Later.

Mr. Balfour presided yesterday at a

Unionist meeting at which there were 500 present, including the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Craven, Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Hugh Cecil. The Unionists unanimously voted confidence in Mr. Balfour. Mr. Chamberlain cordially supported Mr. Balfour. The Duke of Devonshire indicated his inability to agree to the latter's fiscal policy. The Duke will shortly summon a meeting of Unionist Free-traders. Mr. Balfour has intimated to Mr. Chamberlain, that the whole question of fiscal reform must remain the first constructive work of the Unionists, who consider that a moderate general tariff on manufactured goods must fall in the form of a duty on foreign corn, which was unobjectionable in principle but objectionable in practice. Mr. Chamberlain in his reply entirely agreed, and said he would gladly accept the policy that Mr. Balfour indicated and would place his services at his disposal.

DISUNION IN BRITISH CABINET.

London, February 17.

It is stated that there are differences of opinion in the British Cabinet on the subject of the proposed reference of the question of Chinese labour to the Transvaal Legislature. The advanced section of the Cabinet are protesting against what they describe as a breach of faith with the electors.

(Note.—This question of Chinese labour on the Rand was one of the principal topics of discussion during the recent general election in Great Britain. As the Times remarked, the new Government, on taking office, determined to put a stop to the importation of Chinese labour into South Africa, not because the experiment was working badly nor because the supply of other labour on the spot was sufficient for the one great industry of the Transvaal, but because the British workman, who is delightfully ignorant of the whole situation, has been persuaded by the politicians that Chinese labour is "slavery" and that it "keeps out the labour of white men." It is apparently vain to prove to him, says our contemporary, that, on the contrary, it has increased white labour, and that its conditions are practically the same, mutatis mutandis, as have always prevailed with regard to Kaffir labour. If his instructors were to raise the cry, doubtless he would shout just as loud against employing Kaffirs.)

PROTECTING AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The Senate at Washington has passed a shipping bill creating a force of naval volunteers; and subsidising thirteen mail services, including a line to China and Japan.

THE CHINESE DELEGATION.

The Chinese Imperial Mission have left the United States on their way to Hamburg.

THE ALGECIRAS CONFERENCE.

Berlin reports that mediation at the Algeciras conference would be premature as direct Franco-German negotiations are not yet fruitless.

THE TROUBLES IN NATAL.

Two natives of Natal concerned in the recent murders were courtmartialled and shot in the presence of the tribe. The kraals and crops of the natives implicated were destroyed.

MR. CONGER ON THE CHINESE SITUATION.

Mr. Conger, the late American Minister to China, believes that trouble in China is imminent, but to his way of thinking it is anti-Manchu, rather than anti-foreign.

LORD ROBERTS ON MILITARY TRAINING.

London, February 18.

Earl Roberts has issued a manifesto to the British nation defining the policy of the National Service League. He urges that military instruction should form part of the school curriculum, and thereafter compulsory universal naval or military training for a period of four months.

CURIOUS INCIDENT IN MOROCCO.

A curious incident has occurred at Marchica, near Melilla, where the French have established a factory. The Moorish cruiser Turki shelled and pursued the French steamer Zenith, which was calling at Marchica, whereupon the Pretender's artillery ashore shelled the Turki. The French cruiser Larande then intervened and ordered the Zenith to return to Oran.

GERMANY'S PROPOSALS.

Later.
Prince Radowitz, the chief German delegate at the Algieras conference, has proposed to M. Revoil, the head of the French Mission, that the Powers entrust the policing of Morocco to the Sultan with international control. This is entirely unacceptable to France.

FRANCO-RUSSIAN TREATY.

The Franco-Russian commercial treaty has passed the Senate.

MISS ROOSEVELT MARRIED.

Miss Alice Roosevelt was married in Washington on Saturday.

MOROCCO.

London, February 19.
France has replied to the verbal note of the German Mission agreeing to the proposal to entrust the policing of Morocco to the Sultan provided the officers are French or Spanish.

It seems clear that the French steamer Zenith was landing arms and munitions of war for the Pretender, consequently the interference of the French cruiser Larande has raised a difficult question.

M. LOUBET.

M. Loubet formally vacated the Palace of the Elysee yesterday.

THE KAISER AND THE FRENCH.

London, February 20.

Kaiser Wilhelm received Baron de Courcel, the French special Envoy to the funeral of King Christian, on board the German warship at Copenhagen, showing him marked courtesy.

NEW GERMAN ADMIRAL.

It is stated that the King of Denmark will be made a German Admiral.

OPENING OF THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

London, via Shanghai, February 20.

The opening of Parliament on Monday took place with the usual ceremonial, but it was shorn of some of its splendour owing to the mourning for the late King Christian of Denmark, the absence of Queen Alexandra, in Copenhagen; of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India; and of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught in Cape Colony. The King walked with the aid of a stick, but he looked remarkably well and read his speech in a loud, strong voice.

CHINESE LABOUR ON THE RAND.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the Premier, announced in the House of Commons that the Chinese in the Transvaal who were desirous of returning home would not be detained against their will. The Imperial Government would provide funds to repatriate them. The Imperial Government also disallows the judicial punitive methods sanctioned by the recent amending ordinance.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in the House of Commons, and Lord Lansdowne, in the House of Lords, challenged the Government to express its views upon the lying statements contained in election posters that Chinese labour on the Rand was slavery.

CRISIS IN HUNGARY.

The Diet at Buda-Pest was surrounded by troops and the Royal Commissioners sent in a Rescript dissolving parliament and reserving the question of the summoning of another Diet.

The Lower House unanimously returned the Rescript unopened and adjourned.

The Commissioners' delegate subsequently read the Rescript to an empty house. The troops cleared out the officials and sealed the doors.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

London, via Shanghai, February 21.

Germany rejects the proposal, reported on Feb. 19, that the Moorish police should have French and Spanish officers, on the ground that it is contrary to the principles of internationalisation and equality of the Powers.

ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

The Marquis of Ripon, speaking in the House of Lords, said that the new Liberal Government accepted the Anglo-Japanese treaty in the same spirit in which it was made, and firmly intended to carry out its obligations, strictly and readily. He added: "We are proud of any connection with a gallant nation like Japan."

DEATH OF ADMIRAL GRENFELL.

Vice-Admiral Harry Tremenhoe Grenfell, R.N., is dead, aged 61. He was late second in command of the British China Squadron.

CABINET DISSENSIONS.

Later.

It is believed that considerable differences exist in the British Cabinet concerning the Transvaal constitution and the Chinese labour question.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

London, February 22.

It is the general opinion in Paris that the failure of the Morocco Conference is inevitable, as the views of France and Germany on the crucial question of finding officers for the Moorish police are irreconcilable.

TROUBLE IN NIGERIA.

From Lagos, West Africa, an expedition is going to Sokoto where native fanatics have killed a company of Mounted Constabulary, who constituted practically half of the British garrison, besides five white officers, including Mr. Hilary, the Political Agent, and Lieutenants Scott and Blackwood. It is believed that they were taken by surprise, by the followers of a new Mahdi, who are well armed and have captured a Maxim gun. The whole affair was utterly unexpected.

THE TRANSVAAL MINES.

There has been a continuous heavy fall in Stock Exchange quotations for "Kaffirs" on account of the policy of the new British Government regarding Chinese labour. Difficulties are apprehended on the Stock Exchange settling day, Thursday. Since Jan. 22nd, forty of the leading companies shares have depreciated to the aggregate extent of eighteen million pounds.

THE KOWLOON-CANTON RAILWAY LOAN.

Later.

It is officially announced in Hongkong that the (Kowloon-Canton Railway) 3½ per cent. loan for £110,000 has been covered at prices varying from 99 to 100. Nevertheless it is said the underwriters had to take nearly 70 per cent. The Times attributes this to offering the loan by tender.

FRENCH OPINION.

The French press commenting on the Algieras deadlock anticipates that the Powers will mediate in the proposals now submitted by Germany.

Germany has submitted to the Conference a proposal for a state bank for Morocco but withholding from the French any preferential position. The French have submitted a counter scheme.

(By SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE "TOKYO ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

London, February 16.

At a dinner in Paris of the Society of Manufacturers and Merchants, where Mr. Motono was a guest, it was resolved to maintain the closest relations with Japan.

SERVIA.

London, February 18.

News from Belgrade says that Georgovitch, the ex-Premier, has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for revealing state secrets in a book exposing Russian intrigues against the Obrenovitch dynasty. There are 1,300 important political cases awaiting trial.

A MALIGNANT CANARD.

London, February 22.

Washington cables that there are persistent reports that Japan is advising China to boycott American products and to pursue an anti-foreign policy.

The Tribune is convinced that Japan advises the opposite.

(FROM THE "HOCHI SHIMBUN.")

HUNGARIAN AFFAIRS.

Washington, February 21.

Soldiers have turned out the members of the Hungarian Diet on account of the representatives having treated an Imperial message with contempt.

THE MOROCCO CONFERENCE.

London, February 21.

The Morocco Conference proceedings are growing more serious. Germany has refused to give consent to the French proposal for the establishment of the Morocco central bank. She, however, agrees to the establishment of a bank adding that no interference from France in the enterprise can be tolerated.

(FROM THE "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

London, February 21.

According to a Paris telegram, France will certainly not consent to any proposal made by Germany at the Morocco Conference. Public feeling in France is most obstinate in assuming an attitude opposed to Germany.

It is reported by telegram from Algieras that the German attitude at the Conference is very consistent. The commissioners have refused to admit the French proposal with regard to policing and bank affairs.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman speaking in Parliament with regard to the Morocco conference, said that so far as he knew, the British Government would not take any step liable to violate the friendly relations existing between Great Britain and other Powers. Without being actuated by prejudice, the British government was giving its assistance to France. The international conference at Algieras was slowly developing satisfactory signs. In conclusion, he said that there was no change in the cordial relations between Great Britain and France.

(FROM THE "NICHU NICHU SHIMBUN.")

GREAT BRITAIN AND JAPAN.

London, February 20.

The Marquis of Ripon has delivered a speech in the House of Lords. He said that the British Government was willing to carry out strictly and without hesitation the obligations arising from the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Great Britain had great pleasure in maintaining specially close relations with so valiant a people.

FRANCE AND GERMANY.

Profound indignation is entertained in Paris at the German attitude at the Morocco Conference. The French press agree in saying that France has made to Germany her final concessions.

LIGHTHOUSES OF THE ANCIENTS.

A description of some of the most famous lighthouses of antiquity, particularly those which survive until the present or have been restored, appears in the monthly magazine, Prometheus, of Berlin, by Herr Buchwald, a well known German civil engineer. Of course, Herr Buchwald begins with the most famous lighthouse of olden times, the granite tower on the island of Pharos, at the entrance to the harbor of Alexandria, Egypt. This structure was known as one of the Seven Wonders of the Old World, and it certainly must have made a great impression on the incoming mariner. Although the descriptions in classic literature of this unique lighthouse are very meagre, a German architect, Professor Adler of Berlin, has succeeded in reconstructing on paper the famous tower. "The first stone of the Pharos lighthouse was laid by King Ptolemy Logi, about the year 299 B.C. The structure was completed in ten years. The architect, Sostratos of Knidos, obtained royal permission to inscribe on the tower 'Sostratos of Knidos, Son of Dexiphanes, to the Gods, Guiders of the Mariner.' The cost of construction of the entire tower, we are informed, amounted to 800 talents of gold, equal to probably about $1,000,000 (gold) of our present currency. The height was 111 meters (approximately 360 feet); and the beacon light, according to ancient tradition, was visible at a distance of thirty miles. The source of illumination is doubtful. The open shaft, with a pumping device, indicates that oil of some kind was used, and the lantern engraved on local coins eliminates the idea of the open wood fire. All through the wars of the Romans and Mohammedans, up to the middle of the seventh century, the lighthouse was kept in working order. After that, neglect and decay set in, and by the middle of the fourteenth century the famous lighthouse was little more than a ruin." One of the other noteworthy lighthouses of antiquity was the gigantic iron statue at Rhodes, the principle of which has been revived in the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty in New York harbour. This was the famous Colossus of Rhodes. It was destroyed by an earthquake, and, as an oracle forbade its reconstruction, the metal of the famous statue was sold by the conquering Arabs for what would be equal to yen 400,000 of our money to-day. Beginning with Roman ascendancy in Europe, we have more detailed and accurate information about light-houses. The Roman lighthouse was characterized chiefly by its outside staircase, leading to the top, upon which an open wood fire was always kept burning. Probably the most symmetrical of these Roman structures was the tower erected at Ostia, the seaport of Rome, at the mouth of the Tiber, and finished during the reign of the Emperor Nero. The mightiest of Roman light-houses was the one built by the Emperor Caligula at Boulogne-sur-Mer, on the British channel, in memory of his visit to Britannia. This tower, with the one at Corunna, on the coast of Spain, are the best preserved of ancient lighthouses. From old paintings we are able to get an idea of the original construction of the latter tower, which is the only one, excepting the Pharos, which is in any degree of preservation to-day. At the end of the eighteenth century, the Spanish Government restored this tower, and since that time it has served the shipping of the world without interruption.

WILD WITH ECZEMA

And Other Itching, Burning,
Scaly Eruptions with
Loss of Hair.

Speedy Cure Treatment.

Bathe the affected parts with Hot Water and Cuticura Soap, to cleanse the surface of crusts and scales, and soften the thickened cuticle. Dry, without hard rubbing, and apply Cuticura Ointment freely, to allay itching, irritation, and inflammation, and soothe and heal, and lastly take Cuticura Resolvent Pills, to cool and cleanse the blood. A single set is often sufficient to cure the most torturing, disfiguring, itching, burning, scaly, pimply humours, eczemas, rashes, irritations, and chafings, with loss of hair, when all else fails.

The agonizing itching and burning of the skin, as in eczema; the frightful scaling, as in psoriasis; the loss of hair and crusting of the scalp, as in scalded head; the facial disfigurement, as in pimples and ringworm; the awful suffering of infants and the anxiety of worn-out parents, as in milk crust, tetter, and salt rheum,—all demand a remedy of almost superhuman virtues to successfully cope with them. Such are the CUTICURA remedies, the purest, sweetest, most speedy and economical curatives for the skin, scalp, and blood ever compounded. Mothers are their warmest friends.

Millions of Women Use Cuticura Soap

Assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes and chafings, in the form of baths for annoying irritations and inflammations of women, or too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes for ulcerative weaknesses, and many sanative, antiseptic purposes which readily suggest themselves, as well as for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (Chocolate Coated) are a new, tasteless, odourless, economical substitute for the celebrated liquid CUTICURA RESOLVENT, as well as for all other blood purifiers and humour cures. Put up in screw cap pocket vials, containing 60 doses.

Cuticura Remedies are sold throughout the world. Australian Depot: B. Towns & Co., Sydney. British Depot: F. B. Charleshouse Esq., London. French Depot: 2 Rue de la Paix, Paris. Forras Drugg and Chem. Co., Sole Props., Boston, U. S. A.

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

WILD-DUCK HUNTING.

In spite of heavy rain, the wild-duck hunting on Feb. 23rd in honour of Prince Arthur of Connaught was successfully carried out at Niihama, in Chiba prefecture. His Highness left the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace at 8 a.m. accompanied by his suite and by the Imperial Reception Committee. At noon, the Prince and the various members of the hunting party were entertained by Viscount Tanaka, Minister for the Imperial Lodge in the Niihama enclosure. In the afternoon, the sport was resumed, but the birds were very wild. About 5 p.m. His Highness returned to Tokyo. In the evening, he was entertained by Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador, at the Embassy. H.I.H. the Crown Prince, who has not hitherto been present at any foreign banquets extended to the Prince, was among the guests, and also many Princes of the blood, high officers and officials of various departments.

To-day, Feb. 24th, Prince Fushimi will entertain the Prince at noon at his residence. In the afternoon, Prince Arthur will be present at a grand concert in the Ueno Academy of Music, in aid of Japanese charities under the auspices of Their Imperial Highnesses Princesses Arisugawa, Kuni and Nashimoto, Lady Claude MacDonald, Baroness d'Anethan, Mesdames Wilson, Harmand, de Freitas, Flanz, v. der Polder and Thiel. In the evening Prince Arthur will be present at a theatrical performance at the Kabukiza arranged by leading business men of Tokyo in honour of His Highness.

A Sasaho telegram reports that His Highness is expected to arrive there between 3 or 4 p.m. on March 2nd on his way to Kyushu. The naval authorities are making preparation to welcome the Prince. In the harbour, the Shikishima and two cruisers, the Usugumō and eight destroyers, the 11th, 12th and 13th torpedo-boats flotillas and eleven transports which were captured from the Russians are concentrated. Several other warships are on their way to the naval station in order to join in the salutes on the occasion of his arrival.

An interesting report is circulated in Tokyo that on Feb. 24th, Prince Arthur will receive at the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace an old man named K. Amano, residing in Nijikki-machi, Ushigoue, Tokyo. This man was one of the Guards attached to the British Legation when it occupied the enclosure of the Buddhist temple of Tozenji, near Shinagawa, before the Restoration. He was on duty when a number of rioters made an attack upon the building. In appreciation of his meritorious services, Queen Victoria bestowed upon him a medal of honour. Amano is now seventy-five years of age. At the interview to-day the old man will present his Highness with a Japanese poem of welcome. Old residents will remember hearing the late Mr. J. F. Lowder speak of this attack on the British Legation, for he was in the building at the time and narrowly escaped injury.

CONCERT AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC IN UENO.

The greatest efforts had been made by the lady patronesses to obtain the best available assistance for this concert, and, so far as the concert went, it gave every promise of doing credit to their labours. The Orchestra was never heard to better advantage; Mrs. Lee Lee sang with exquisite intonation, her sympathetic voice delighting the audience; a trio by Professor Dr. von Koeber, Professor Junker and Mr. Schmid was unanimously pronounced one of the finest performances ever heard in the Academy, and two admirably rendered choruses brought the first part of the programme to a brilliant conclusion. But here a most unfortunate contretemps occurred. Prince Arthur and his suite, doubtless finding that a dinner engagement at Prince Arisugawa's did not permit them to remain until the end of the concert, left the Hall at the end of the first part, and through some mismanagement, for which they were not responsible, their exit was preceded by some unnecessary symptoms of fuss. The audience, whose nerves had already been tuned to a high pitch by the formidable earthquake in the forenoon, conceived the notion that the Prince's exit was dictated by anticipation of another of these perturbing phenomena, and so, at first quietly but in the end with considerable show of precipitancy, they vacated the Hall completely and left the second part of the programme to be suspended or performed to empty benches. It was a most unhappy accident. Subsequent inquiry showed that some busybodies had been attributing to the Meteorological authorities via the police an exact prediction of the advent of an earthquake between 3.20 and 4.30 p.m. Needless to say that the tale was a pure canard, but the police ultimately found it necessary to post notices repudiating the action assigned to them; and thus the second chapter of the farce was opened, for people seeing police notices about an earthquake, did not take the trouble to read them, but ran off open-mouthed crying out that now in fine the end had come. However, there are happily very few of these gobe-mouches in a Japanese city.

ENTERTAINMENT BY THE BUSINESS MEN OF TOKYO TO PRINCE ARTHUR.

The exceedingly inclement weather that prevailed during the first four days of Prince Arthur's sojourn in Tokyo must have effectually prevented His Royal Highness from seeing anything but Japanese interiors. A Japanese February generally does take its departure in rain and sleet, but these unpleasant visitors are seldom so persistent as they have been this year. The great fête organized by the Business Men of the Capital, however, did not depend in any degree on the weather. It was brilliantly successful and it achieved most admirably its main purpose, namely, that of giving to Japan's English visitors an opportunity of taking a glimpse at the customs of all her ages, from the Fujiwara epoch down to the Meiji era. The performance took place in the Kabukiza Theatre, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion, the general scheme of decoration being red and white drapery, broken by large peonies and relieved by numerous festoons of electric globes. A change of plan was adopted as compared with the arrangements on the occasion of the Alliance fête to the British Navy. The box for Admiral Noel and his officers formed the centre of what would correspond with the dress circle in a western theatre, but for the use of the Prince and his suite a large pavilion had been specially built near the back of the pit directly facing the stage. It was spacious and handsomely decorated, and every contrivance to secure the comfort of the Royal visitor had been furnished. The Prince and his suite did not arrive until past ten o'clock, and in consequence of the delay thus occasioned, the performance, which had been carefully adjusted so as to occupy a convenient space of time, could not be concluded until long past mid-night. The Prince did not wait for the end. He took his departure at about half-past eleven, thus missing some of the most beautiful parts of the plays and sorely disappointing his hosts, who had been at infinite trouble to prepare a representation of an altogether exceptional character. On His Imperial Highness' arrival he received a deputation of the leading Business Men of Tokyo and was handed by Baron Shibusawa the following Address:—

To His Royal Highness

Prince ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT,

Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS:—On behalf of the Business Men of Tokyo we beg to thank You respectfully and profoundly for Your gracious presence here this evening, and to assure You that we represent the sentiment of all the citizens of Japan's metropolis when we welcome the coming of Your Royal Highness to this country with the deepest gratification. We rejoice in the event because the special purpose of Your Royal Highness' mission is to draw closer the bonds of friendship which happily unite Your Illustrious Sovereign and our beloved Emperor. We rejoice in it because it indicates the stability of an Alliance which aims at permanently preserving peace and asserting the principles of the open door and equal opportunities for all; principles which lie at the very root of trade and industrial prosperity. And we rejoice in it because it enables us to declare, in the presence of a Prince of Royal and Imperial England, our admiration for a country to which, during many centuries, the whole world has looked for models of economic enterprise and free institutions, and to thankfully acknowledge the debt that Japan, in every stage of her modern progress, has contracted towards Your great nation.

We entreat Your Royal Highness to pardon the very inadequate nature of the hospitality we venture to offer You this evening, and, in the name of the Business Men of Tokyo, we respectfully tender sincerest wishes for the perpetual welfare of the Royal Family of Great Britain and for the ever-increasing prosperity of the peoples who have the happiness to live under its beneficent rule.

This Address had been inscribed on a Japanese scroll illuminated by Kawabata Gyokusho, Ogawa Gekko and others among the most celebrated artists of the day. If the Prince has any taste for Japanese art he will treasure this object as one of the valuable souvenirs of his visit to Japan. Care had been taken to provide a full digest of the various plays so that even persons entirely ignorant of the Japanese language had no difficulty in following them. This digest was as follows:—

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

ILLUSTRATED BY AN OLD STORY

(Specially written for the occasion by Taro Masuda, L. S. C.)

ACT I, SCENE I.

LOCALITY: By the sea-shore at Hemi in Sōshū.

PERIOD: Autumn in the year 1600.

Autumn flowers are blooming and between the rocks waves are seen raging. On a rock in the centre of the stage Iwai Tetsunojo, a rōnin (unattached samurai) of Osaka, stands holding the girdle of Otsu, a young girl who is gazing distractedly in the direction of the sea. Giheiji, father of Otsu, has gone to look for her brother who has been absent for many days on a fishing expedition, and the girl, fearing that her father also is in danger, was endeavouring to put out in a small boat to his rescue when the rōnin Iwai interfered. This rōnin is in love with Otsu, but being a man of bad character (one of a band by whom the people of the vicinity are much oppressed) he has been unable to obtain her father's consent to their union. He now restrains Otsu from her desperate undertaking; points out to her that a boat managed by one weak woman could not possibly live in such a sea, and declares that the punishment of heaven has now overtaken her father for refusing her lover's suit. Otsu angrily repels him and asks whether she could ever become the wife of a man who urges her to desert her father in his extremity. Iwai, rendered desperate by her resistance, threatens to use his sword and is forcing her to accompany him when Anjin (Will Adams) attracted by the noise of the struggle, runs up and separates them. Iwai reviles him as a foreigner and warns him that his life will be the cost of interference. But Anjin replies that all nations alike recognize the duty of the strong to succour the weak. Iwai attempts to cut him down but Anjin gets the better in the struggle and Iwai flies. Anjin then, learning the cause of Otsu's trouble, leaps into the boat she had intended to use and succeeds in saving her father, who, on recovering from his swoon, tells her that all hope of her brother's life must be abandoned. Father and daughter then express profound thanks to Anjin and, in the course of the ensuing conversation, they learn from him that if they are grieving for the loss of a son and brother, he has been nine long years lamenting his separation from his family in England, and is now rejoicing in the thought that a Dutch vessel has reached Hirado and that he will be able to return to his country forthwith. He then insists on aiding Giheiji, who has not yet recovered from the effects of his immersion. But on the way they are attacked by a band of ronin with Iwai at their head, Anjin is seized and bound, and although Otsu and her father offer to take his place, the ronin carry him off.

SCENE 2.

Neighbourhood of the same place: Prince Tokugawa Iyeyasu approaches riding in a "norimono" and with a large retinue of samurai.

Giheiji runs up desperately and prostrates himself in front of the procession. He is quickly followed by Otsu, and father and daughter vie with one another in calling aloud for assistance. To present a petition direct to the Shogun being a capital crime, Giheiji and Otsu are seized and bound by the Tokugawa chief's retinue. But on learning their errand, Iyeyasu orders their release and sends a party of samurai under Giheiji's guidance to rescue Anjin. During the absence of the samurai Iyeyasu questions Otsu, and learns from her the occasion that induced her and her father to bray death for Anjin's sake. Presently the samurai return leading Anjin, Iwai and the latter's fellow-ronin. Iwai, questioned by Iyeyasu, accuses Anjin of dealing in necromancy and producing supernatural effects; but Iyeyasu replies that he himself has been Anjin's pupil in the science of Western civilization, and that when the ronin, without any due authorization, subjected Anjin to indignity, they were guilty of a direct insult to the Shogun. They are bound with ropes and led off in custody. Anjin then asks Iyeyasu as to the latter's object in visiting Hemi, and Iyeyasu replies that it is to solicit the continued presence of Anjin in Japan. He explains that after granting permission for Anjin to take passage home by the Dutch vessel, he reflected that to perpetuate the peace in which Japan was now rejoicing, her intercourse with foreign countries must be extended, and that the assistance of Anjin would be essential for that purpose. Anjin nevertheless declares himself unable to abandon the hope of seeing his family once more, and then Iyeyasu confesses that, apprehending this difficulty, he has already sent away the Dutch ship. He declares that his first consideration must be for the good of the country which he has been trusted by the Emperor to administer, and that he is content to incur resentment if he can be conscious of having done his duty. Anjin becomes reconciled. He declares that it is the will of heaven, and he bows to Iyeyasu's frank statement that if he has subjected his foreign visitor to a hard lot, it was done because of the high esteem in which he holds Anjin's services. The Shogun then expresses a desire to make some amends to Anjin, and suggests that as Anjin is separated from his sister and as Otsu has just lost her brother, they should endeavour to console one another. It is finally arranged. Iyeyasu laughingly observes that a woman's hair is proverbially strong enough to bind even a big elephant, and that a Japanese girl will soften the pains of exile for Anjin. He orders that an income of 50 koku of rice shall be given to Giheiji, who in the excess of his delight, almost forgets to express his gratitude.

ACT II.

The interior of the Shogun's Castle in Yedo. Iyeyasu, Anjin, Otsu, Giheiji, several nobles (Daimyo) and a number of attendants and dancing girls are present. The occasion is the celebration of Anjin's wedding with Otsu. A congratulatory series of couplets are uttered by the Daimyo, each delivering a line separately until the last, when all speak in unison. Iyeyasu expresses his satisfaction that Anjin is to remain. He says that though Japan is a small country, her people mean to make her the Japan of the world, and that the ceremony of this evening shows how close East and West are after all. Anjin and Otsu perform the prescribed rite of exchanging wine-cups, and on its conclusion Iyeyasu confesses that he has still one apology to make to Anjin: the Dutch ship has not been sent away from Japan; she is still at Hirado. Does Anjin still wish to return by her? Giheiji and Otsu await Anjin's answer with much anxiety, but he declares that he will remain in Japan. The ceremony ends with a geisha dance.

THE VENDETTA OF THE SOGA BROTHERS.

TIME, 1193 A. D.

Place, the hunting encampment of the Shogun Yoritomo at the southern base of Fujiyama.

The Soga brothers, Juro and Goro, are celebrated in Japanese history as the first practical disciples of the Confucian maxim: "A son should not live under the same sky with his father's assassin." Their father had been murdered by Kudo Suketsune, and they determined to take vengeance on the murderer by surprising him when he accompanied Yoritomo's hunting expedition. They achieved their purpose, but Juro was killed in the struggle and Yoritomo ordered Goro to be beheaded.

The scene discloses Fujiyama and the wild undulating country on its south-western slope. Here and there are seen rude structures erected as temporary residences of the Daimyo, a number of whom Yoritomo has invited to partake in the hunt. The Soga brothers have seized this occasion not only to wreak vengeance on the slayer of their father, but also if possible, to kill Yoritomo at the instigation of Hojo Tokimasa. Most conspicuous among these rude structures is that of Kudo Suketsune, the principal object of the Soga vengeance.

Soga Juro, the elder brother, and Soga Goro, the younger, enter stealthily to reconnoitre. A woman in night garments, emerges from the building with a light. The brothers conceal themselves till she re-enters, and then creep in after her with drawn swords. A heavy storm of wind and rain is raging. At this point a party of samurai on guard make their appearance. They have been warned of the existence of something suspicious but, being unable to discover anything, they withdraw.

Presidently from the interior of the hut cries are heard of "traitors," "assassins," and the brothers run out with gestures of joy. They then resolve that as heaven has aided them so far, they will die such a death as shall render their names illustrious. They therefore raise their voices aloud: "We, Juro and Goro, sons of Kawazu Saburo, who in his day was counted as a god for strength, have taken vengeance on his murderer. Let those that seek fame by slaying us, come on." This defiance is speedily answered. A number of samurai hasten from all directions. The brothers cut down many. Goro now enters in search of Yoritomo leaving Juro outside.

At this point Niita Tadatsune, a renowned warrior of Yoritomo's party, rushes out with a glaive (naginata), and challenges Juro to single combat. The two men engage. After a fierce fight Juro's sword is struck from his hand and he stands resigned to die, but Niita picks up the weapon and restores it to him. Finally Juro receives a wound in the leg and falls.

The stage now revolves and shows a corridor in the interior of Yoritomo's hunting lodge. Goro is seen resting for a moment when suddenly the voice of Niita Tadatsune is heard announcing the death of Juro. Desperate with grief Goro now heads for the inner apartments, bent upon killing Yoritomo. But he is met by Goshō Goromaru, who, though wearing a full suit of mail, has thrown over it a woman's outer-garment. Goro, thinking he has to do with a woman, thrusts Goshō aside, but is seized from behind by the latter and ultimately over-powered.

THE SCULPTOR'S DREAM.

The scene opens on a park surrounding the residence of Count Sakuramachi.

In the distance is seen an old-style palace and in the middle distance a profusion of flowers in bloom. Four large rocks in the garden support platforms on which are mounted the following statues:

1. Shizuka, the celebrated Shirabyoshi (danseuse) of the Kamakura Era (A.D. 1180).
2. Shyushiki, a lady dressed in a costume of the Genroku Era (A.D. 1688).
3. Seishonagon, the renowned authoress of the Imperial Court at the close of the 10th century.
4. Omiwa, daughter of a wealthy merchant of the Fujiwara Era.
5. Masaoka, a lady-in-waiting of a Daimyo's house in the Tokugawa Era.
6. Yoshitsune, (A.D. 1180).
7. Benkei, (A.D. 1180).

All the above figures are dressed in the costumes and furnished with the accessories that were in fashion in their respective eras.

There now appears upon the scene Hidari Jinsai, a celebrated carver of the era, who is employed at the Art School. A number of his pupils accompany him. Jinsai tells his pupils that Count Sakuramachi is an ardent patron of art and that he has selected 14 of the most beautiful figures on the Japanese stage and ordered them to be sculptured with the utmost care. This work has now been achieved. By the zealous assistance of the pupils of the Art School, the Count has declared himself fully satisfied. Each of the pupils makes obeisance to his master and one of them remarks that it would be a delightful culmination of their work if some of the figures would show their appreciation of the artist's skill by becoming sentient beings. Jinsai replies that although instances of that kind were not wanting in ancient times, unfortunately there have been no examples in modern days, whether because art has depreciated or the gods have ceased such supernatural displays. He renews his thanks to his pupils for their able assistance and also asks them to leave him for a time to rest in the presence of their work. Jinsai then seats himself and drops asleep. In his dreams he is visited by a heavenly messenger in the shape of a little child who tells him that the beauty of these works has been appreciated by the gods and that they have ordered him to carry to the artist two packets of incense which, if burned in the presence of the sculptures,—the green packet for the men, the red for the women—each statue will become a sentient being. Jinsai awakes in great astonishment and imagines that he has seen a senseless dream, the product of his own imagination, until he observes that the two packets of incense are actually lying beside him. He then calls out excitedly to his pupils and relates the whole story to them. As they hasten in, they decide to try the experiment with the female figures first. When the red incense is burned these figures begin to dance, and then the green is burned with the same result in the case of the men. Jinsai calls out that they must extend the experiment to the other figures in the mansion, and an inner curtain rising displays the following figures:

1. Yoshiye, the renowned Minamoto warrior at the beginning of the 12th century.
2. A figure of a soldier dressed in the uniform of a sergeant major of the Guards to-day.
3. Yuyoi, a lady of the Tokugawa Era.
4. Dokwan, the designer of Yedo Castle (A.D. 1500).
5. Tadanobu, a warrior of the Kamakura Era (A.D. 1180).
6. Komachi-Hime, (8th century).

Some curious phenomena result from mistakes made in burning the incense, certain of the female figures behaving as if they were men. Ultimately all obey the fumes of the incense, and after an animated dance resume their original condition as inanimate images.

It need scarcely be said that refreshments were served on a sumptuous scale and that all the arrangements did much credit to those concerned.

AT ST. ANDREW'S CHURCH.

H. R. H. Prince Arthur of Connaught attended divine service at St. Andrew's Church, Shiba, Tokyo, on Sunday forenoon. Rev. L. B. Cholmondeley, Chaplain of the British Embassy, preached, taking for his subject the seemingly humble progress of the Kingdom of Christ upon earth, and basing his sermon on the words, "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth"—S. Luke, XV., 10. He alluded briefly to the pleasure it afforded the congregation to welcome the Prince at the Sunday worship.

AT THE PALACE.

At 6.30 p.m. on Sunday, His Highness proceeded to the Imperial Palace to say farewell to His Majesty the Emperor. His Majesty received His Highness in the Phoenix Hall. Subsequently the Prince and his suite were entertained in the Homei Hall. To-day the Emperor will pay a visit to His Highness at the Kasumigaseki Palace, leaving the Imperial Palace at 10.30 a.m.

Apropos of the farewell dinner given on the evening of Feb. 25th by His Majesty the Emperor to His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught, some details are given in the Japanese press. The Garter mission, it appears, left the Kasumigaseki Palace at 6.30 p.m. in company with the Imperial Reception Committee, being escorted by a troop of cavalry of the Imperial Body Guards. On arrival at the Palace, Count Toda and other Masters of the Board of Ceremonies welcomed His Highness and his suite and conducted them to the Phoenix Hall, where the Emperor received them at the entrance, in company with His Highness Prince Arisugawa. Subsequently a banquet was served in the Homei Hall. The seating arrangements were as follows:—

His Highness spoke briefly, expressing his gratification at the reception given him since his arrival in Japan. Prince Tokugawa (Keiki) returned thanks on behalf of the Japanese guests.

Prince Tokugawa (Iesato) representing the whole of the Japanese peers has presented a magnificent piece of lacquer ware to Prince Arthur.

THE CITIZENS OF TOKYO.

The fete promoted for the reception and entertainment on Monday of Prince Arthur of Connaught was blessed by dry weather, though as the afternoon wore on the sky became over-clouded and there were even a few drops of rain. The threatened disaster—for it would have been nothing short of a disaster if wet weather had set in during what was practically an open air gala—did not take place, however, for which every one present may well be grateful. But the day was bitterly cold, and it was a great trial to stand about in the open or even to avail of the shelter provided for the occasion, for the icy wind penetrated everywhere in the form of draughts. There was an exception to this in the fine building where tiffin was served. In this, an edifice of ancient form, the company that assembled about 1 p.m. enjoyed a large degree of comfort. There were over 200 present. Mr. Ozaki Yukio, Mayor of Tokyo, presided, having on his right Prince Arthur of Connaught and several Imperial Princes were also present.

The menu was as follows:—

Hors d'oeuvres.
Potage tortue clair.
Truite saumonée à l'imperial.
Caille à la toscane.
Fillet de Boeuf à la Brillat-Savarin.
Foie-gras en aspic.
Asperges sauce diable.
Dinde truffée rôtie, Salade.
Creme à la monaco.
Biscuits glacés.
Fromage.
Dessert.

There was very little drinking of healths, the toasts proposed being those of the Rulers of the British and of the Japanese Empires which were received with bansais, the band playing the respective National Anthems.

Afterwards the Prince and the party of hosts and guests proceeded to the great stand which was constructed in arc form to face the Imperial Hotel and the other buildings on that side of the Park and about the centre of which was the Royal Box. Thither His Royal Highness, who was accompanied by a brilliant company of ladies and gentlemen, was conducted and his appearance was greeted with bursts of cheering from the vast crowds that filled the neighbouring streets.

The following address (for a translation of which we are indebted to the Japan Times) was then read by the Mayor:

To His Royal Highness Prince ARTHUR FREDERICK PATRICK ALBERT OF CONNAUGHT, K.G., G.C.V.O.

May it please Your Royal Highness.—It is with a sense of great gladness and deep respect that, on behalf of the citizens of Tokyo, I offer the very heartiest welcome to Your Royal Highness, and express sincere gratitude for the honour you have conferred on the City by accepting its invitation and coming among us to-day.

We beg leave also to express to Your Royal Highness our heart-felt appreciation of the act of your August Sovereign in presenting to our beloved Emperor the Insignia of the Order of the Garter, which we understand is the highest of Orders in your country. And we respectfully beg to thank Your Royal Highness for taking this long journey from England to Japan especially on this mission.

The bonds of friendship between Great Britain and Japan, already established firmly by the Treaty of Alliance, will be further strengthened by this new proof of cordiality between the Imperial Families of the two countries. Indeed, all Japanese rejoice in this opportunity to welcome a Member of the illustrious Reigning Family of our Allied Nation; and we wish to avail ourselves of the present occasion to assure your Reverend Ruler and the people of the British Empire, that we are proud to co-operate with your country in the noble task of promoting the cause of peace in Asia.

We sincerely hope that your sojourn in Japan will be pleasant and agreeable.

(On behalf of the Municipality of Tokyo).

Your Royal Highness' most obedient, humble servant,

YUKIO OZAKI, Mayor of Tokyo.

Prince Arthur said in reply:—

SIR,—I thank you most sincerely for the address of welcome which you have presented to me on behalf of the citizens of Tokyo to-day. The high mission of presenting to H.I.M. the Emperor of Japan the insignia of our most noble Order of the Garter, with which I was entrusted by the King of England, is one which has given me the highest pleasure to fulfil. The marks of honour which the Mission has received from H.I.M. the Emperor will be deeply appreciated by my country. The kindness and friendship shown me by the Imperial Family have greatly touched me, while the splendid welcome and demonstration of goodwill with which the Mission was received in the streets both on our arrival and again to-day, the magnificent entertainments offered by the official representatives of the Imperial Army and Navy, and the Business Men of Tokyo, the cordiality shown us by all with whom we have been brought in contact, and finally this splendid reception offered us to-day by the citizens of Tokyo, have made a deep and lasting impression upon our minds and hearts. The honours, the kindness and the hospitality shown to myself and to the Mission will be highly appreciated by my Sovereign and by his people, who recognise in this evidence of friendship and goodwill the wish to cement unmistakably the ties of alliance which now so happily exist between the two countries.

Prince Arthur was again greeted by rounds of cheering, a special bansai being provided for in the programme.

Afterwards a number of events were exhibited for the Prince's benefit. They were:—

1. "Daimyo-gyoretsu" (Procession of a Japanese Lord.
2. "Teodori" (Japanese Pantomime Dance.)
3. "Koma-mawashi" (Top Performance.)
4. "Hyaku-menso" (Hundred masks.)
5. "Daikagura" (Lion Dance, Playing Balls, etc.)

H.R.H. left the Park about 4 p.m.

From 1 to 4 p.m. a capital display of day fireworks was made from a part of the Park.

DEPARTURE FOR THE COUNTRY.

Prince Arthur left Shimbashi at 10.30 a.m. on Feb. 27th for Shizuoka. Prince Arisugawa, representing His Majesty the Emperor, was present on the platform to bid farewell to the Prince. It is needless to say that the platform was crowded by Princes and Princesses of the Blood, and high officers and officials of various Departments, as well as by the foreign representatives, their wives and staffs. Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador; General Baron Kuroki; Admiral Togo; Mr. Nagasaki, Councillor of the Palace; Mr. Asano, Master of the Board of Ceremonies, and Messrs. Asakura, Yamashita, Tokioka, Shinagawa, Adachi and Takaoka, officials of the Imperial Household and the Foreign Office, and the members of the Garter Mission accompanied His Highness. The special train passed Hiranuma at 11.10 a.m. at ordinary speed. On the platform no one was allowed. The train consisted of a first class carriage for the Imperial Reception Committee; a dining carriage; a saloon carriage for Prince Arthur; another saloon for his suite and the Reception Committee; and finally a carriage for the officials of the Railway Bureau. The Royal train arrived at Shizuoka at 3.45 p.m. and His Highness put up at the hotel Taito-kwan. To-day, Feb. 28th, His Highness will leave Shizuoka at 8.45 a.m. and is expected to arrive at Kyoto at 5.26 p.m.

The Jiji says that a large arch was erected in front of the Shizuoka railway station bearing the word "Welcome" on the upper portion and it was farther decorated with the British and Japanese flags combined. The streets through which His Highness passed were decorated in a most tasteful manner. On the Prince's arrival twenty-one day fireworks were discharged, but their effect was somewhat marred by the inclement weather. On the platform were gathered officers and officials of various local Government offices and representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, the branch of the Ladies' Patriotic Society, and many other public bodies, as well as foreign residents.

After arrival at Shizuoka at 3.40 p.m. on Feb. 27th, Prince Arthur paid a visit to the Industrial Bazaar in the enclosure of the former Shizuoka Castle. In an upstairs room of the building he was entertained to tea in Japanese style and with koto music. The Prince purchased various articles and at 5.50 p.m., returned to his hotel when he was entertained with dances and music.

According to the Kohshun, the following is the speech given by Admiral of the Fleet Sir Edward Seymour at the luncheon at the Yokosuka Naval Station on Feb. 22nd:—

"I feel much honoured in returning thanks for the British Navy but have no hesitation in doing so because I am confident that what I am going to say represents the feeling of every one in that Navy. The British Navy has followed the victorious career of the Navy of Japan with the greatest interest and admiration. The geographical positions of Japan and Great Britain are the same. Both being island Empires situated on the edges of great Continents, for each a steady Navy was a paramount necessity. There was a general impression that the Japanese Navy had in the course of its development received some assistance and instruction from the British Navy. The knowledge and experience of modern naval warfare gained by Japan under these circumstances had enabled her to become instructor to others. In conclusion, I must say that the battle of the Sea of Japan was the Japanese Trafalgar, and that I am sure everybody in England regarded Admiral Togo as the Nelson of Japan, and that the English Navy all hope the two services will remain united in spirit and interest as their Nations now happily are by the treaty."

At 5.25 p.m. on February 28th, His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught arrived at Shichijo Railway Station, Kyoto. On the platform to meet him were many high officials of the local government and representatives of various public bodies, as well as the Lords Abbot of the well-known Buddhist temples Nishi and Higashi-Hongwanji. The Prince drove to the Miyako Hotel in a carriage sent from the Imperial Household Department. In spite of the rainy weather the streets through which His Highness passed were crowded and many enthusiastic cheers were raised. The decorations consisted principally of Japanese and British flags combined.

The First squadron—consisting of the Yakumo, Adzuma, Iwate, Otorwa, and Chihaya under Vice-Admiral Kataoka—which left Yokohama on February 26th, is on the way to western ports to escort His Highness Prince Arthur. The other warships ordered to welcome him at the respective ports are allotted as follows:—Kagoshima—Tokawa, Chihaya and first squadron of destroyers. Miyajima—Kasuga and torpedo-boat flotilla. Etajima—Idzumi and destroyers or torpedo-boats. Ujina—Kasuga and torpedo boat flotilla. Kobe—Iku (formerly Nicholai I), Chiyoda and the 13th destroyer squadron.

It is reported by the Kokumin that on March 15th, His Highness will give a dinner at the Kasumigaseki Palace to the members of the Oxford and Cambridge Clubs, including Marquises Kuroda and Hachisuka, Count Matsukata, Baron Kikuchi, Mr. Hamano, Viscount Inaba, Mr. Inagaki, Minister to Bangkok, now in Tokyo on official business, and Mr. Soyeda, President of the Nippon Industrial Bank; Baron Suyematsu, Counts Soyejima and Hirozawa, Professor Takakusu, etc. On this occasion, the Japanese notables intend to present His Highness with a number of puppets dressed in historical costumes.

The following is the speech delivered by General Sir Thomas Kelly Kenny when replying on behalf of the British Army at the luncheon given by the Minister of War at the Korakuyen on Feb. 21st:—

"Your Imperial Highnesses, Excellencies, Military Comrades and gentlemen. I am happy in being selected by my Sovereign to form part of this Mission and the more so as I am honoured in the opportunity afforded me of expressing to you of the Army of Japan our sincere gratitude to His Imperial Highness Prince Fushimi for the manner in which he has proposed the toast of the health of the British Army and to this assembly for the manner in which it has been honoured. It has been a personal pleasure and satisfaction to me to become acquainted with the great though modest leaders of your army. We in the British army from its Head, our King, downwards, I assure you, followed your great achievements in the field with interest and with admiration.

Sir, on the part of the British Army, I thank you and I trust that in the interests of the alliance and civilization, prosperity may always wait on your arms, and that Providence may prolong the useful lives of my Comrades, your illustrious generals."

The following is a correct list of the decorations conferred by Prince Arthur upon Japanese officials. Grand Cross of the Victorian Order:—Viscount Tanaka, Marquis Tokudaiji, Count Toda, General Baron Okazawa. Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George, Count Inouye, Marquis Saionji, Mr. Kato Takaaki, General Baron Kuroki; Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George:—Mr. Nagasaki, Mr. Takahira, Viscount Fujinami; Knight Commander of the Victorian Order: Marquis Kido; Commander of Victorian Order:—Viscount Inaba, Captain Takarabe; Member of the Victorian Order:—Mr. Asano, Mr. Watanabe, Count Terashima.

KOREA.

The Il Chin-hoi are reported to have decided to issue a manifesto on the occasion of the arrival of Marquis Ito in Seoul. The main feature of the document is reported to be that the Koreans admit the protectorate of Japan and that under Japanese guidance they hope to develop the various resources of Korea.

The wedding ceremonies of the Korean Crown Prince will take place in October.

Matters are reported to be quiet in Son-chin, Kyonsyon, Wonsan and Hamheung, where Japanese guards are stationed. The "Scholars," however, are instigating the people to oppose the Japanese officials and to take steps for the abolition of the Japan-Korean Convention. Moved by this incentive, the untutored people hesitate over paying their taxes. The Shogyo says that at Ham-heung, the head-quarters of a Japanese Division are stationed.

The Kokumin has a telegram from Seoul to the effect that on the evening of Feb. 20th the preliminary trial of Ching Soukuen and Li Pongshak, who are suspected of being implicated in the recent attempted assassination of the Minister for War, took place in the Seoul Supreme Court. They are reported to have made statements conveying enlightenment as to the cause of the affair. They said, it is reported, that the crime was instigated by Cho Pyong-sik, ex-member of the Cabinet, and Ming Yonghwan who some weeks ago committed suicide after the conclusion of the Japan-Korean Convention. They are said to have confessed also that about eight hundred persons in Seoul oppose the Treaty and the present Cabinet. The Kokumin's correspondent adds that in all probability there will be wholesale arrests.

At Onyang in Chungchong, a number of natives have created a disturbance and tried to set fire to Japanese houses. Some Japanese gendarmes were sent there on Feb. 23rd from Syu-uon.

Fire broke out on the night of February in a carriage attached to a train not far from Masan. Some Japanese were killed or injured, and others are missing.

The destroyers Shirakumo and Asagiri arrived at Mokpho on February 25th. They are assigned to Korean waters as guard vessels.

Mr. Ching Songkuen, ex-member of the Cabinet, who was arrested after the attempted assassination of General Li, Minister for War, was released on bail on Feb. 23rd.

In connexion with the recent trouble at Shu-uon, which is alleged to have arisen in consequence of the feeling entertained against the Japan-Korean Convention, the Asahi's Seoul correspondent says that close investigations were made by the Japanese police, and it was found that the affair arose through a collision between Korean natives and Japanese coolies.

Marquis Ito, Resident-General, arrived at Fusan at 5 p.m. on February 28th. He was formally welcomed and subsequently left for Seoul. A meeting of Japanese residents will shortly be held in Seoul at which Marquis Ito is expected to give an outline of his policy in the peninsula.

To-day, March 2nd, being the birthday of the Korean Crown Prince, General Baron Hasegawa, Commander of the Garrison, Marquis Ito, Resident-General, and their staffs will proceed to the Palace to present congratulations.

We learn from the Nichi Nichi that passports for foreigners, hitherto granted by the Korean Foreign Office, will henceforth be given through the Residency-General or the various residencies.

THE KOGYO GINKO.

The Industrial Bank, or Credit Mobilier, held an extraordinary general meeting on Feb. 27th. Mr. Soyeda, President, submitted a proposal to add seven million five hundred thousand yen to the present capital (ten million yen) and said that Messrs P. Gordon and Co., of London, had promised to take up the whole of the amount at face value, the value of each share being fifty yen. With increased capital, added the chairman, the bank will be able to enlarge the scope of its business in foreign countries and will endeavour to afford greater facilities to any company in Japan who may find it advantageous to issue debentures; the bank could also handle national bonds in foreign markets. Several questions were asked by shareholders: (1) Was it intended to allow rights on equal footing with Japanese to Messrs Gordon and Co. without special conditions, the bank having a reserve of over five hundred thousand yen which at present is regarded as protecting from loss present native shareholders? (2) Did the bank make any special effort at the time when the Government issued its war loans and several business companies raised loans abroad to facilitate these measures? (3) Messrs. Gordon and Co., accept unregistered shares—a hundred and fifty thousand in number—and are thus able to sell them anywhere they like. In such case, the London capitalists can not be regarded as beneficial supporters of the bank, while further, those who obtain shares by purchasing from Messrs. Gordon and Co. are not bound by any obligation made by the sellers to the Japanese bank.

Baron Shibusawa, one of the directors, in reply to the foregoing enquiries, said that Messrs. P. Gordon and Co. were among the most substantial capitalists of London. The chairman also explained the details of the transaction, after which the proposal was passed.

BURGLARS IN THE "HERALD" OFFICE.

A little before 9 p.m. on Feb. 27th, the printing department of the Japan Daily Herald, No. 61, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, was entered by two men. While attempting to steal some type, which they put into a hempen bag, K. Nakajima, the watchman, appeared on the scene, having been warned by hearing a suspicious noise. He arrested one of the thieves, but the other escaped. The apprehended man is a youth—seventeen years old—named S. Kato, an apprentice of Y. Fukazawa, a gold and silver smith, No. 211, Furo-cho, Nichome, Yokohama. The statement made by the youth at the Kaga-cho Police Office was to the effect that he is the second son of R. Kato, formerly living at Hachioji. When he was four years old, he removed to Shizuoka together with his parents and two brothers. The same year his father deserted the family.

The lad then went up to Tokyo with his mother, and she found work in a paper factory belonging to Hiraoka, a paper merchant, at Koishikawa, Tokyo. When he was nine years old, he was employed as an apprentice by his present employer. The accused further said that on the evening of Feb. 27th, he met a man—his name he did not know, but his age was about twenty-five years—who was employed by the gold and silver smith last year, at Hagaromo-cho on his way from Ogi-machi, where he bought sweet cakes. The elder man asked him to help in a burglarious enterprise. They broke into the printing office through a window. The Kaga-cho police are still examining the youth.

The police report that on the night of Feb. 24th, the German Consulate-General in Yokohama, was entered by a burglar or burglars, who stole nine yen and several articles valued at about forty yen.

CHINA.

Saturday, February 24.

No definite conclusion, says the Jiji's Peking correspondent, has been come to at the Russo-Chinese Conference. The present meetings seem to be merely of a preliminary character. Prince Ching, and Viceroy Yuan and Ku have not yet personally attended the conference.

A telegram has been received from Manchuria by a Chinese Government office to the effect that mounted-banditti in Liaotung have joined the Chinese garrison. The Viceroy of the province has granted official rank to the leaders of the Hungtuts.

The Chinese Minister for Railway Affairs has paid a visit, under Government instructions, to Mr. Uchida, Japanese Minister, and announced that in accordance with the new convention between Japan and China, the Hsinmintun-Mukden Railway, shall be sold by Japan to China after the withdrawal of the armies from Manchuria. Yet the Chinese Government hears that the Japanese are busily engaged in altering the gauge and employing the permanent way for uses outside military purposes. The Chinese Minister added that the Chinese Government was embarrassed to know the real views of the Japanese. The Japanese correspondent does not give the reply of the Japanese Minister.

In connexion with the concession obtained by a British syndicate from the Chinese Government for the construction of a railway between Suchou and Ningpo via Hanchow, Chinese capitalists of Chekiang are, it appears, trying to induce the Chinese Government authorities to consent to the cancelling of the concession and to transfer to them the relative rights.

The Jiji's Peking correspondent is to be started in the centre of the tea industry of China under the style of the Hankow Daily News, the first issue to appear on March 15. As the projectors point out, Hankow, now that it connects with Peking by rail, is rapidly becoming one of the leading commercial ports in the Far East.

Monday, February 26.

A telegram (Jiji) from Peking states that with the exception of the American Minister the foreign representatives are of the opinion that as the Waiwupu (Foreign Office) is composed almost exclusively of progressive statesmen and as the two Viceroy's Yuan Shih-kai and Chang Chih-tung dominate their respective districts with troops trained in foreign style, no apprehension need be felt as to any recurrence of trouble. The American Minister is reported to have said that he never asked his Government to despatch warships to China in anticipation of disturbances. The correspondent adds that the Chinese are closely watching the American Government bill regarding the revision of the regulations as to Chinese labourers which has been submitted to Congress. They intend to organize a boycott against American trade if the bill, which is believed to be unfavourable to Chinese emigrants, is passed in Congress and endorsed by the President. The Jiji's correspondent says that much anxiety is now entertained among foreigners.

According to the Asahi's Peking correspondent the trouble created by the Kolao-hui at Chingchou in Hunan province is spreading. The French Minister in Peking has required the Waiwupu to take steps for the protection of foreign residents. A Washington telegram to the Asahi with regard to the assault on a Catholic missionary by a number of natives at Chingchou, which is elsewhere published, seems to have some reference to the foregoing matter.

The Governor of Nanchon in Kiansi was assaulted on Feb. 22nd by a native Christian named Wan Kuan while being entertained at a French religious building. The governor was severely injured with a sword. There are no details as to the cause of the attack.

The Chinese Government has decided to send a Secretary of the Department of Finance to Japan to investigate Japanese methods of dealing with financial affairs and to adopt some similar schemes. This official will leave shortly for Japan.

The promoters of the Shan-sih Railway Company have decided to start the work of construction. The railway will extend from the capital of Shan-sih province to Changkiakaw via Tayuen, Sihyuen and Yihwaching. At Changkiakaw it is intended to join the Peking-Changkiakaw Railway.

Viceroy Tung Chao-ye, one of the Chinese Commissioners at the Russo Chinese Conference, is reported by the Hochi's Peking correspondent to have had a consultation with Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai on Feb. 20th and 21st at Tientsin. They concluded to adopt the following measures: (1) Abolition of mining concessions in the Amur districts that may have been given to Russians by China; (2) the recovery of Kalachin, which place is now occupied by the Russians; (3) to consent to the Russian request for a concession for the construction of a railway in the Amur district; (4) to fix a definite date when the withdrawal of the Russians is to be completed; and (5) to obtain Russia's consent for the opening of Harbin to foreign trade. The Hochi's correspondent adds that the Chinese commissioners decided to secure an amicable settlement at the outset with the Russians in regard to the foregoing five proposals; otherwise they will not fall in with the Russian requests.

Tuesday, February 17.

With reference to the assault by a native Christian named Wan Kuan upon H. E. Kau, Governor of Nanchon, Kiangsi province, published in our last issue, the Shanghai correspondent of the Asahi says that the Governor arrested a native Christian on suspicion, and a petition was presented to him asking for the release of the man. The Governor dismissed the petition, whereupon Wan Kuan, one of the petitioners, became so excited that he sprang at the Governor and cut him down with a sword. He inflicted such injuries that the condition of the victim remains still very serious.

The Hochi's Peking correspondent says that the Chinese Government intends to establish an Embassy in Tokyo.

The Peiyang Construction Bureau is engaged in establishing two wireless telegraph stations—one at Peking and another at Futien.

The construction of electric light works in Peking by Chinese capitalists is nearly completed, and business will commence on March 15th.

According to a report in a Chinese newspaper, translated by the Nichi Nichi, the foreign ministers in Peking who are conducting negotiations with the Waiwupu regarding the Shanghai Mixed Court affair, will abandon the idea of an indemnity. The Chinese paper says that if the foreign representatives insist upon the Chinese Government paying an indemnity, the latter will insist on stationing Chinese soldiers in the concession of Shanghai for the protection of Chinese residents. The Powers are not willing to have the Chinese guards in the Settlement, and so they will abandon their claim.

Wednesday, February 28.

The Jiji has a telegram from Shanghai to the effect that the Rev. and Mrs. H. C. Kingham and their two children have been killed by Chinese rioters at Nau-chang, in Kiangsi. No detailed report had yet been received. A later telegram to the same paper reports that six Roman Catholic priests have been murdered besides the Kingham family. The insurgents set fire to all the foreign churches at Nau-chang and destroyed them. The Governor of the district saved other foreign missionaries by sending them to Kiukiang in a steam launch.

An American warship, says the Asahi, has left Shanghai for Nau-chang with a view to protecting American missionaries and other foreigners.

Most unfortunately for herself China has always on hand for immediate use a large and unruly element, the units of which have drunk in with their mother's milk intense umbrage against foreign ways and foreign aggressions. These men, whose blood is perpetually at fever heat, can easily be driven to violence by the most trivial incident, and foreign onlookers are only too ready to infer that the whole Chinese nation is deeply imbued with anti-occidental sentiment. The terrible incidents just reported from the province of Kiangsi will doubtless be construed as further proof that China has fallen into a mood of ferocious unreason and that only by the application of drastic measures can the situation be restored. It is futile to deal with that aspect of the question just at present, but every journal possessing any information ought to raise its voice vehemently against those unscrupulous attempts that are being made by certain American newspaper men to persuade the world that Japan is doing everything in her power to increase the anti-foreign fever in China. "Unscrupulous" is the only epitaph to be ascribed to these attempts, for it is impossible to suppose that men capable of expressing themselves intelligibly in the English language should be so wholly deficient in the reasoning faculty as to credit the absurd falsehoods they string together. We strongly suspect that these gentlemen who, while themselves furnishing a conspicuous example of the grossest mendacity, would doubtless be ready to pen essays to-morrow about Japanese commercial morality—we strongly suspect that these writers belong to the class of disgruntled correspondents who, because Japan did not provide a war panorama for their special benefit, left the East swearing that they would get their "knives in" sooner or later. There is at least one consolation, namely, that their crusade must be discredited by its own silliness. The Chinese Government, according to telegrams received in Tokyo, has instructed its representatives abroad to assure foreign governments that these anti-Christian outbreaks in Kiangsi and elsewhere are not to be attributed to any generally pervading sentiment, but are merely the acts of the riff-raff population. Rumour says that this particular outbreak had its origin in an act of violence committed by a Roman Catholic priest against the person of the Governor of Nau-chang. The number of victims appears to have been ten, including two children, the pathetic element which usually enhances the horror of Chinese anti-missionary riots.

A Shanghai telegram says that Mr. Li Lieng-yong, a special attendant on the Empress Dowager, has been released from office and excluded from the Imperial Palace.

From letters received at Shanghai from Hankow on the 12th February by a prominent American firm (says the Shanghai Mercury) it is learned that the boycott has started afresh in Hankow with redoubled vigour. Indecent posters of various descriptions, it is stated, are being distributed in abundance and placarded in the native city. Another American firm in Shanghai has received copies of placards which are being posted about the native city. The posters are illustrated and represent Chinese being put in cages, etc., on arriving in American ports from China. One of the largest American firms in the East sent a letter recently to H.E. Chou Fu, the Viceroy, on the boycott question and the answer they received from him was that he would consult the boycott committee and students and see what they intended to do in the matter and he would then let the firm know the result.

The following "Notice to French Merchants" was recently published in the Echo de Chine:—According to a note from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the Consulate-General of France at Shanghai, it appears that in consequence of the reiterated overtures of the French Legation to the Japanese Government, the latter has ordered the raising of the interdict on the conveyance of foreign merchandise into Manchuria via Siumintung. The importation of French merchandise into Manchuria by this route can therefore henceforth be freely effected, under the reserve, however, of the production of certain certificates required according to the terms of an agreement interposed between the commissioners of the Russian and Japanese armies.

Thursday, March 1.

Mr. Rockhill, American Minister, says the Jiji's Peking correspondent, has visited an official of the Waiwupu and intimated that according to a telegram from the American Consul at Hankow, some young men have organized a society under the appellation of Hsing-ku hoi, which designs to restore ancient systems. As a first measure they oppose foreign religions and the import of American merchandise. Their influence is daily growing. The American Minister asked the Chinese official to arrest the leaders of the party and to take all necessary steps for protecting the lives and property of foreign residents.

The proposed withdrawal of foreign guards in North China has not yet commenced. A Peking telegram to the Jiji says several foreign representatives are still opposed to the withdrawal of the troops as proposed by China and are trying to induce the Chinese to come round to their view.

A sensational report is circulated from Nagasaki. According to news brought by the British steamer Tartar, which arrived at Nagasaki on Feb. 27th from Hongkong, British and American warships in that place are making all preparations for emergencies. A German warship was engaged in reconnoitring in a certain direction. These movements are in connexion with the troubles in China.

A Peking telegram says that Mr. Pokotiloff, the Russian Minister, has not been present at the Russo-Chinese negotiations for some days owing to trouble with his throat.

The Asahi has a telegram from Peking that China intends to present a claim to Russia for the Customs duties which the Russian authorities have collected at Yingkow for several years past. The Chinese Government has ordered General Chong, Governor of Mukden, to ascertain what amount had been collected by the Russians.

Friday, March 2.

Further reports with regard to the disturbance at Nan-chang in Kiangsi province have been received in Tokyo. A Shanghai telegram (Jiji) says that by the assistance of the Chinese authorities five foreign nursing sisters and twenty-seven missionaries, including three Catholic priests, have arrived at Kiukiang. Mr. A. P. Quirmback, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, is still at Nan-chang. The eldest daughter of Rev. Mr. Kingham, who was severely wounded by the rioters, died while on her way by steam-launch to Kiukiang. The corpses of the foreigners who were murdered by the natives were brought to Kiukiang on February 27th. The French cruiser Descartes and the American gunboat Eleanor have left Shanghai for Kiukiang.

The Asahi's Shanghai correspondent gives a curious report as to the Chinese trouble at Nan-chang. Wan-kuan, who murdered the magistrate of Nan-chang, is not a native, according to this correspondent, but a French missionary whose real name is Laksier (?) It seems to be suggested that the foreigner had disguised himself as a Chinaman. Before the murder the priest invited the Magistrate to his church and there through a converted native named Liu made an illegal demand upon the official. The last named resisted the demand and a warm debate ensued with the result that the Magistrate seeing no other course open attempted to commit suicide. While he was in the act of turning a sword against his own throat he was set upon by Liu and the French priest, who stabbed him twice, inflicting wounds to which he succumbed on Feb. 27th. Wan-kuan, alias Laksier, fearing the anger of the Chinese, set fire to his church and sought to escape but was caught while fleeing from the burning building and killed. The foreign newspapers of Shanghai, adds the Asahi's correspondent, express sympathy with the murdered official but deep indignation at the outbreak. The Governor-General of Kiangsi is reported to have requested the French Consul at Shanghai not to despatch a warship to Kiukiang until the troubles have been settled by the native authorities. The French cruiser Descartes, however, has gone up river and a British gunboat is proceeding to Nan-chang.

A later telegram from Shanghai states that order has been restored in Nan-chang and that five thousand troops are stationed at various points.

We learn from a Peking telegram in the Jiji that in consequence of the Nan-chang outbreak the Governor of Kiangsi has tendered his resignation. A Chinese official version of the origin of the outbreak says that pretexting a desire to entertain the magistrate of Nan-chang the French missionary invited him to his house and took him to a private room where he produced a letter and asked the official to sign it. On the latter refusing because the request made in the letter was injurious to the public peace, the missionary menaced him with a revolver and finding himself thus intimidated the magistrate attempted to commit suicide, injuring himself with a sword.

Keen as must be our sympathy with the victims of these terrible outrages, the question of real moment is the significance attaching to them in an international sense. Do they really represent the beginnings of a general anti-foreign movement in China or are they merely a recurrence of acts which have marred the story of China's relations with the West ever since her people discovered themselves to be degraded beings in Occidental eyes? Japanese papers seem a little perplexed to answer these questions. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun which for obvious reasons must be held to speak with exceptional discernment writes in very strong terms. It says that the so-called policy of Rights' Recovery is in reality inspired by anti-foreign feeling. Granted that China succeeded in getting back into her own hands all the mining, railway, and other privileges hitherto granted by her to foreigners would she herself utilize them? It is exceedingly doubtful. The strong probability is that her motive is uniquely to recover these privileges without any thought of what should be done with them after recovery. Thus this movement is to be regarded not as the outcome of China's deliberate perception of her own capacities, but rather as an outbreak of the resentment that has been smouldering for years in the bosom of the Chinese in consequence of their masterful treatment by foreigners. Pushing its analysis a step further our contemporary thinks that this outbreak reflects in part the influence produced in China's mind of the Russo-Japanese War. The Chinese, seeing simply the victories won by their Oriental neighbour, formed a new estimate of Oriental puissance and without analyzing their own capacity arrived at the conclusion that merely by combination anything could be achieved. Thus their anti-foreign feeling is a kind of sentiment built entirely on an entirely hollow foundation. Nevertheless the premise must be admitted that the present commotion has its origin in anti-foreign feeling and that if a match be applied to this magazine by any strong and ambitious hand a very serious explosion may result unless the Peking Government takes speedy steps to deal with the trouble in its early stages. It is not impossible that the very integrity of the Empire may be imperilled.

The Shogyo Shimpō agrees that the disorders in southern China have their origin in anti-foreign feeling but says that their proximate cause according to the views of foreigners and Japanese alike is to be sought in the fact that Japan's signal victories opened China's eyes. It is very well that China's eyes should be opened, but how can we regard as the result of a genuine awakening her present violent and murderous attempts to recover her rights? Were she really in earnest she would have paused to consider her own resources before engaging in this desperate scheme. It is reported that Japan has conveyed a warning to China but no practical effects are yet visible. If China's awakening were a gradual process: if she proceeded by deliberate and circumspect methods to assert herself she would deserve to be congratulated. But nothing can be more hazardous than an essay to recover all at one coup rights and privileges which have been enjoyed by foreigners for many tens of years. By such action she not only imperils her own independence, but also threatens to involve in serious trouble Japan also, whose position will compel her to assist in restoring order within her neighbour's territory.

The Chuo Shimbun while admitting that great disturbances generally have their proximate causes in petty events thinks nevertheless that the events now occurring in China are not prompted simply by anti-foreign feeling but have their origin in a desire to exclude foreigners altogether from the trade and industry of the country. In that respect this disturbance differs from the Boxer riots. There is in fact a combination of sentiment and business, a combination which represents considerable force. Some people say that what we are now witnessing is the awakening of the Chinese people. We do not share that view. The real awakening of a nation would not be signalized by such unreflecting displays of anti-foreign sentiment. Could anything be more silly on China's part than to grasp at the recovery of rights which she cannot herself enjoy? Could anything be more foolish than to slaughter missionaries for that purpose when the murder of one missionary cost China Kiaochow? In a word China is staking her very existence on a most reckless enterprise and Japan should spare no effort to restrain her.

The Yomiuri Shinbun on the contrary says that according to the reports thus far received the Roman Catholic priests themselves would appear to have been directly responsible for the Nanchang trouble and that it would consequently be premature to ascribe the affair to anti-foreign feeling. Nevertheless it will have the effect of intensifying that feeling and thus we come back to the old trouble that if the relations between foreigners and Chinese are ever to be pleasant and smooth the conduct of religious propagandists must be subjected to greater restraint.

The Kokumin Shinbun writes vehemently with regard to the extraordinary charges preferred by the New York Tribune against the Japanese. It describes these charges as a deliberate attempt to injure the friendly relations existing between Japan and America, and as an exhibition of ignorance seldom displayed in the columns of a great newspaper.

A telegram to the Kokumin from Peking says that on receipt of a report that the Hungtutz from Manchuria were crossing the frontier into Chili, German troops were concentrated at Shan-hai-kwan with a view to preventing the banditti from committing a raid.

A sensational report is published by the Hochi to the effect that Russian workmen employed on the Amur portion of the Siberian Railway have joined with Mongolian tribes and mounted banditti. They are making preparations to create a rebellion against the Russian Government.

The North-China Daily News, in an article on H. E. Tsên Ch'un-hsuan, Viceroy of the two Kwang, known to foreigners in Hongkong as Viceroy Shum, reminds us that he is the eldest son of Tsên Yü-ying, the Viceroy of Yunnan, who put down the Mohammedan rising so ruthlessly. As our contemporary says, "he actually made a solitude, and called it peace." The present Viceroy Tsên, was specially sent to Canton to put down the so-called rebellion in his native province. His appointment was hailed with delight by the Cantonese; for he made himself so popular when he was Provincial Treasurer at Canton that when the news came that he was to be transferred, the people built a wall of bags full of rice in front of the gate of his yamen, to prevent his leaving them. We quote the rest of our contemporary's article in extenso, as there is a possibility of Viceroy Tsên coming to Japan with his family, as soon as he can obtain leave:—

Gradually, however, the exercise of the arbitrary, power of life and death, and the difficulties he has in dealing with the corruption and incompetence rampant in the civil and military administration of his two provinces, have entirely changed his nature. He has retained his ability to govern, but the inherited bloodthirstiness in his character has come to the surface. He has been ruthless in his dealing with the so-called rebels in Kuangsi, and in his chastisement of the corrupt officials under him; he did not hesitate, as we reported some time ago, to publicly drink the blood of a bandit whose execution he was attending; and from being the most popular official, he has now become the best-hated man, by foreigners and natives alike, in the two southern provinces. Having scorned when he went to Canton to avail himself of the illegitimate sources of revenue exploited by some of his predecessors, and having to meet the expense of constant and protracted expeditions against the rebels in Kuangsi, his treasury has been badly supplied, and he has had to impose taxes which have alienated his people. He has shown himself lately a violent enemy of foreigners; he has made no real efforts to suppress the boycott; he turns a deaf ear to the representations of the foreign Consuls, and refuses, under the plea of sickness, even to see them; and on the same plea he evades attendance at the banquets which his position obliges him to give from time to time. One of his latest exploits has been to seize a large quantity of coal belonging to an official whom he has cashiered and whose property he has confiscated, this coal being mortgaged to a foreign bank in Hongkong; but he will listen to no remonstrances. The foreign Consuls, the American especially, can get nothing out of him. Having been forced to buy back the Canton-Hankow railway from the American syndicate, he has been endeavouring to raise from the merchants and people the funds necessary to construct the line. This source failing, largely in consequence of his unpopularity, he determined to raise the funds by new taxation. A large meeting of the gentry and merchants of Canton was held to protest against this course, the ex-Viceroy of Min-Chê, an old man, coming out of his retirement to head the movement. This so angered him that he arrested two of the leaders of the gentry, thoroughly representative men of the highest character, and deservedly most popular with the Cantonese people. These two gentlemen, Li and Liang, were selected by the Kuangtung gentry to confer with the gentry of Hupêh and Hunan as to the best means of raising funds to construct the railway, and on their return they were arrested by the Viceroy for not agreeing with his views. Numerous remonstrances have been addressed to the Throne, and to the northern Viceroys, Yuan Shih-kai, Chia'ng Chih-tung, and Chou Fu, and the Throne has ordered the two latter to send their best men to Canton to investigate the matter, and report. The following extract from the Canton correspondence of the Hongkong Daily Press, referring to a telegram sent by the ex-Viceroy of Min-Chê, on behalf of Kuangtung gentry, to Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai, will show the feeling prevalent in Canton:—"Ex-Viceroy Hsu Ying-k'uei, on behalf of the Kuangtung gentry, has addressed another telegram to Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai, denouncing Viceroy Tsên as 'pertinacious and tyrannical, treating the laws with contempt, and embroiling the people. The whole province is 'bubbling with revolt', which encourages bandits and robbers. A rising of ten thousand angry people is possible, and other provinces may be involved in such a calamity. . . . All Canton is shaking. Every day that Viceroy Tsên is allowed to remain, the situation will grow worse."

A Peking dispatch states that the Waiwupu has lately been receiving telegrams from all parts of the country asking that Sir Chentung Liang-cheng, K.C.M.G., etc., Chinese Minister at Washington, whose term of office expires this spring, be retained in his post for another term. The request will probably be granted.

The North-China Daily News reports that the Chinese Consultative Council elected at Shanghai as the outcome of the recent riots consists of the following gentlemen:—Mr. Wu Shao-ch'ing (elected Chairman of the Committee) chief compradore of Messrs. Arnhold Karberg & Co., and President of the Silk Guild; Mr. Yueh Ping-han (elected Vice-Chairman of the Committee), President of the Piece-goods Guild; Mr. Yu Ya-ch'ing, compradore of the Netherlands Bank and a member of the Committee of the Chinese Bankers' guild; Mr. Chou Chin-chên, Manager of the Head office of the Chinese Commercial Telegraph; Mr. Chun Fai-ting, Business Manager of the China Merchants' S. N. Company in Shanghai; Mr. Sieh Lun-hui, President of the Chinese Bankers' Guild; and Mr. Chu Pao-san, President of the Sundries Goods Guild. Taken as a whole these gentlemen are said to be a body of thoroughly representative men of the Chinese Merchants of Shanghai amongst whom it would be difficult to obtain a better set of business men, combining intelligence and liberality in their views.

The Waiwupu has increased the stipends of the Chinese Ministers to Great Britain, France, Russia, the United States, and Japan by 3,000 taels annually, and that of the Ministers to other countries by 2,000 taels.

The German Emperor has conferred upon Sir Robert Bredon the Order of the Crown of Prussia, 2nd class, with the Star.

The report of the Shanghai Land Investment Co., Ltd., whose paid up capital is Tls. 2,600,000, for 1905, shows a divisible balance, after deducting the interim dividend of 6 per cent. paid till July last, of Tls. 248,875. It is proposed to pay a final dividend of 6 per cent., making 12 per cent. for the year, to put Tls. 40,680 to reserve, and carry forward the balance, Tls. 52,195.

The Peking-Kalgan, or Ching-Chang, Railway that is now being built is entirely in the hands of Chinese, there being not a single foreigner connected in any way with the construction from its very conception. The work is under the superintendence of Taotai Chan Tien-yu, better known as Jeme Tien-yow, A. M. I. C. E., London, a returned American student, who graduated from the Sheffield Scientific Department of Yale University, U. S. A., in 1881 where he obtained his degree of Bachelor of Philosophy. A portion of the Ching-Chang Railway is to be tunnelled a distance of nearly a hundred feet at the Pata Pass, or Pataling, near the Great Wall. When completed the new line will have cost the Chinese something about seven and a-half million taels.

PROPERTY AT PORT ARTHUR.

The Chefoo Daily News, through the courtesy of Mr. Fowler, American Consul-General, is enabled to publish the rules imposed by the Japanese upon persons desirous of looking after their property interests on the Liaotung Peninsula, and particularly at Port Arthur. The rules are as follows:—

- 1.—Owners or their representatives, of private properties which were left behind by foreigners during the late war, in the district under control of the Governor of Liaotung Peninsula may enter Dalny or Port Arthur with licence of the Department of State for War, and investigate, dispose of, and carry away that property according to this Rule.
- 2.—Those who have left their properties at Port Arthur are required to give information of their own and their companions' name, age, profession, nationality, residence, lodging house and the purpose of entry, to the Department for Civil Affairs in Port Arthur within twenty-four hours after the arrival at that place, and to the written report a copy of the licence of the Department of State for War must be attached.
- 3.—Those who have left properties at Dalny or other places except Port Arthur are required to present the above mentioned written report to the Department for Civil Affairs in Dalny.
- 4.—Above mentioned persons will be required to stay in Port Arthur or Dalny, and if they wish to travel to other places, they must secure the permission of the Department for Civil Affairs at Dalny or Port Arthur.
- 5.—Owners of private properties which have been left behind without consignees or guardians, and which have been taken up by authority of the Japanese Government, are required to petition for the recovery of their property to the Department for Civil Affairs at Dalny or Port Arthur within eight months after the date of this Rule, and if they fail to do so, they will lose the claim to their properties.
- 6.—In the above mentioned written petition the quality, amount, value, location of the properties, and the retired date must be mentioned with a Japanese translation. If the petitioner is the representative of the owner of the property, he must file a letter of attorney, with a Japanese translation. When translation into Japanese is impracticable the English or French language may be used.
- 7.—As regards the disposal or taking away of the properties all persons must obey the order of the Military Department of Port Arthur or Dalny.
- 8.—Those who have obtained permission of entry will be allowed to stay during thirty days, but not longer, and in extraordinary cases more delay may be allowed by the Civil Department in Dalny.
- 9.—Besides this rule the regulations which have been issued by the Governor General of Liaotung Peninsula must be observed.

Jan. 27th, 38th year of Meiji.

THE KAISER'S SILVER WEDDING.

The Kaiser has nearly completed the eighteenth year of his reign and on the 27th February completed the twenty-fifth of his married life. It has been a great reign. Indeed considering that the terrible but fame-giving adjunct of war has been entirely absent, we may probably say with truth that no sceptre has ever been swayed in such a conspicuous manner. The Emperor has the gift of giving greatness to everything he touches. It is not always a convenient gift but on the whole it makes for the glory of his country, which he has certainly enhanced to a magnificent degree. There is, however, no brighter chapter of his career than his married life. He has been a model husband and a model father, and for these things his countrymen owe him unqualified gratitude. We wish him and the noble lady who supports him in his strenuous life, many years of health and happiness.

The celebration in Yokohama of the 25th anniversary of the wedding of the German Emperor and Empress was most successful from every point of view, and its results were highly gratifying to all who engaged in it. The weather, unfortunately, was far from propitious—in fact the conditions about the time when people who intended to be present at the Club Concordia had to venture from their homes were exceedingly disagreeable—yet nearly two hundred people participated in the proceedings. These included a considerable number of ladies, Count Arco-Valley and the staff of the Legation, most of the German community in Tokyo, and German and Swiss members of the Club Concordia. The Club was most handsomely decorated with national flags and other emblems and presented a charming and striking appearance.

The evening's proceedings opened shortly before 9 p.m. when the following programme was entered upon:—

JUBEL OUVERTURE.

TANZ.

It need hardly be observed that this short entertainment was much appreciated and greatly applauded. Mr. Binder's prologue, it should be said, was written as well as recited by himself and was accorded an enthusiastic reception, and the Festspiel was also original and most strikingly illustrated the various subjects represented by the ladies mentioned. Supper was laid in the billiard-room, from which the tables had been removed and a large horseshoe table prepared. The Consul-General, Mr. Von Syburg, in an address, spoke of the occasion on which they were gathered together and dwelt upon the example set by the home life of the Emperor and Empress, calling for cheers for the august couple, which were given with the utmost enthusiasm. Rev. Mr. Haas, of Tokyo, spoke of the proposal to establish a German House in Yokohama as a souvenir and memento of the event which they were celebrating, and expressed the hope that it might be carried out so that every one would have something to remind them of this occasion. The toast of the non-German members present was proposed by Mr. Binder and responded to on behalf of those concerned by Mr. H. Abegg. Dancing then began and was kept up till after 3 a.m. to the music of the Imperial Guards Band.

It should be remarked that the programme of the evening was a very artistic work, bearing on its first page excellent portraits of the Emperor and Empress and their children.

THE FAMINE IN THE NORTH.

In earnest sympathy with the distressed people of the famine districts in Japan, on whose behalf an appeal was made by President Roosevelt, donations are being made by the American public through the offices of the Christian Herald. As a first remittance the Herald has sent ten thousand dollars to the Japan Red Cross Society through Mr. Hioki, Japanese acting Minister in Washington. On Feb. 22nd, the representative of the Japan Red Cross Society made arrangements with the authorities of the Department of Home Affairs as to the proportions in which the amount is to be distributed in the three prefectures—Iwate, Fukushima, and Aomori.

According to private correspondence it would appear that in some quarters there is a disposition to censure the Government for not having taken more active measures of relief in the famine-stricken districts. It is always difficult to deal with charges of sins of omission. In this case what the Government actually did, which critics do not seem to have taken much trouble to ascertain, is certainly very considerable, and what it did not do is measured simply by their own estimate of what it might have done. Any careful reader of the accurate painstaking reports sent in again and again by the missionaries, whose humane efforts in this matter cannot be too highly extolled, must have observed several passages referring to the extraordinarily efficient character of the organization devised by the local officials for dealing with the distressed. One writer said that he could hardly have believed in anything so thorough and others were scarcely less emphatic. These writers did not enter into any minute detail of official labours. The immediate purpose of their own charitable efforts being to supplement those of the Government; in other words to fill up the gap which officially dispensed charity must always leave, they did not feel called upon to explain at length what the Government was doing. We suggest that they might now add to their useful work some account which would allay the suspicions and mitigate the censures referred to above. At the end we shall doubtless have from the communal officers a full account of what they have done and what money has been expended. But for this, some months will have to be still waited, and in the meanwhile it is possible that a false conviction of official backwardness may be closing some private purse strings. Unfortunately when the subscription lists were first opened a strong disposition was shown in some quarters to discover this reason or that for hesitation to give. Nothing in the world is so easy as to invent excuses for one's own want of generosity. That is not the spirit of the old ideal:

“Careless their merits or their faults to scan,

He gave to pity ere charity began.”

That kind of temper was probably in a great degree responsible for the comparative reluctance shown by the foreign community in responding to the appeal of distress, and those who suggested the mood have now much to answer for. As to the Government, its dominant policy seems to have been to encourage a spirit of self-help among the people rather than a spirit of dependence on charity. Perhaps that policy was carried too far. We have not sufficient materials to form a judgment. But it is very certain that no supineness was shown and that public works on a very large scale were organized in several districts.

The Rev. H. Loomis writes as follows:—In some of the local papers it was reported that the Christian Herald of Boston had raised $10,000 for the relief of the famine sufferers in Japan. It was also stated that the Red Cross Association had raised $10,000 through the Christian Herald. The Christian Herald is published in New York and was for many years edited by the Rev. Dr. Talmage. The present editor and proprietor is Lewis Klopsch and the Rev. G. H. Sandison and Rev. B. J. Fernie are associates. One of the most prominent features of the paper is the attention that is given to charity; large sums are frequently contributed by its subscribers to any worthy objects which are presented. During the famine in Russia a ship was chartered by the proprietor and loaded with corn for the relief of the sufferers. The same was done at the time of the famine in India. At the request of the missionaries in Japan an appeal was made in its issue of January 31st for similar assistance. As the result of that appeal $10,000 was contributed and when it was known that cheap rice could be easily procured here the money was entrusted to the Red Cross Association to be forwarded to Japan. Owing to the excellent service that has been rendered by the Japanese Red Cross Society during the war it was thought that such an organization would be a suitable medium for the succour of those in the north who are in distress for want of food.

Donations received by the Tohoku San-Kyujitsu-kwai from the public amounted to yen 107,606.94 on Feb. 22nd. This sum has already been sent in five installments to the Governors of the prefectures affected.

Messrs. Blackmore & Co. of Kobe kindly inform us that they have received the following cable from their Sydney correspondents—Messrs. C. E. Waters and Co., of Kent-street, Sydney:—

“Mr. Samuel Hordern of Messrs. Anthony Hordern and Sons, Sydney, N.S.W., has donated 5,000 bags flour for starving Japanese people.”

We understand that Messrs. C. E. Waters & Co. are shipping the above quantity of flour by quickest route and consigning same to Messrs. Blackmore & Co., of Kobe. The flour is to be delivered in Japan free as an unconditional gift from Mr.

Samuel Horden for the relief of the famine-stricken people in the North. We may add that advice of this handsome donation has been communicated to Governor Hattori and a reply has been received from Mr. Nagai, Chief Secretary of the Ken, stating that he is "delighted to hear of such a very generous gift from an Australian merchant," and requesting Messrs. Blackmore & Co. to be the medium of the benevolent work later on.—Kobe Herald.

As those who have been contributing garments and pieces of cloth to the Mission Schools to make over for the sufferers in the famine section will probably be interested to know the result, we beg to make the following statement. Over one thousand garments, in all, have been made and taken, or sent, since January 20th. Of these thirty were blankets or futon covers; seven hundred kimono; and the balance smaller articles of various kinds.

All have been received, and all have been distributed, except the very last. The greater part of this work has been done by the five mission schools (Jo Gakko), of Yokohama Bluff.

The schools propose to go on working as long as the great need continues. Any one desiring to help in this form of relief may send clothing to Mrs. Booth, No. 178; Miss Converse, No. 34; Miss Crosby, No. 212; Mrs. Van Petten, No. 221, or to Miss Williams, No. 244, all on the Bluff.

The clothing, when made over, is carried without charge to the famine section.

This is, of course, quite a separate work from the donations of money which have been made, and the subscriptions of three yen per month for the assistance of needy families, which a number of ladies are giving.

The latter work will be reported later, when the list is complete.

CAROLINE VAN PETTEN.

The Executive Committee of the Yokohama and Tokyo Foreign Residents' Association for the Relief of Sufferers by the War gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following sums towards the Famine Relief Fund now being collected:—

	Yen.
Amount already acknowledged.....	7,467.85
Mr. G. E. Gregory.....	25.00
"Japan Gazette" (additional collections)...	31.00
Prof. John H. Wigmore, N.W. University of Chicago.....	100.25

The guild of Yokohama silk merchants has subscribed yen 4,575 to relieve the distress in the famine districts.

Mr. Huntington Wilson, the American Charge d'Affairs, has transmitted to the Japan Red Cross Society, through the Minister for Foreign Affairs, the sum of 40,100 yen ($20,000) contributed by the American Red Cross Society, who collected the money through the Christian Herald, for the purchase of food for the famine sufferers in the northern provinces of Japan.

Some socialists held a meeting in Tokyo on Feb. 25th and agreed that the people in the famine districts must be relieved at the national expense. Messrs. T. Shiba and Y. Yamaji were elected delegates to submit their proposal to the Home Office.

The Japanese consul at Ottawa has wired to the Foreign Office that the Canadian Government has purchased five hundred tons of flour (valued at twenty-five thousand dollars) to assist in relieving the famine in Japan. Two hundred and forty-five tons will be shipped by the Athenian at Vancouver on March 5th, and the remainder by another steamer.

MENACE OF A TIN FAMINE.

Is a tin famine one of the possibilities of the near future? Mr. George L. Underhill, an expert mineralogist, speaking before a New York audience of mining-men, evidently thinks that the trade depends upon a very precarious set of circumstances. As he points out, the total world's production of tin was in 1893, 67,700 tons; in 1895, 75,000 tons, dropping back slightly for the next four years, but rising again to 78,000 tons in 1900, and to 86,900 in 1902. The present output should not be far from 90,000 tons, with little or no increase probable during 1906, advices from the Straits giving conservative estimates of about 5 per cent. reduction in output from this source in the present year, or, say, a reduction of about 2,500 tons. Australia probably will increase its output slightly, and efforts are being made to open known deposits in Annam, and some work is being done in Alaska, where good deposits of excellent tin have been found, but none of these can have any appreciable effect on the situation for 1906. Consumption has outstripped production, a visible supply of 40,000 tons in January, 1897, with an annual consumption of 69,000 tons, having dwindled to 13,500 tons on January 1, 1906, with a consumption of around 90,000 tons. The decrease in visible supplies was very rapid from 1897 to 1903, amounting to 22,500 tons, the reduction since amounting to only 4000 tons, the shortage of 1905 being 1000 tons. If it were not for the extremely low state of the present visible supply, the situation would not be alarming, as a very slight increase in the output would, if the consumption did not correspondingly increase, soon restore the equilibrium, but at the present moment the world is living from hand to mouth. As it takes three months for tin to reach New York from Singapore, the first being the principal port of consumption and the latter of supply, a world's supply of 22,500 tons is necessary to keep things just moving, and as the visible supply is only 13,500 tons, an invisible supply of 9,000 tons must be assumed to make a proper balance. This must be in the hands of consumers, as points of production seem to be very closely sold up, and it is altogether probable that the consumers, owing to extreme high prices, are not carrying more than the bare necessities of the case demand. The situation is critical—a probable increased consumption, a probable decreased production, and insignificant visible supply, no margin is left for accidents of any kind. A drought or flood, a strike or epidemic in the Straits Settlements, or even a succession of losses at sea of tin-bearing vessels, and a tin famine will be upon us, with prices soaring to the zenith and many consumers entirely out of supplies and none to be had. It behooves all users of tin, said Mr. Underwood in conclusion, to watch the trend of visible supplies, and if they show any material reduction from the present amount to stock up at once for probable wants, no matter what the price of tin.

THE RECENT GENERAL ELECTION.

Mr. Malcolm Lincoln, writing from London to the New York Commercial, says that in many respects the late election campaign in Great Britain was remarkable for the number of ladies of high rank who took an active part in it. Both of the leading parties had more than the usual quota of feminine orators and canvassers, and the Independent Labour party shouted itself hoarse in commendation of the efforts put forth in behalf of its candidates by the dainty Countess of Warwick. As lovely to look upon as she was ten years ago, perfumed, gowned in lace and coated in ermine, she went on the stump with the enthusiasm of a Frenchwoman in the days of the Terror. Some of her doctrines were scarcely less revolutionary than the declarations of the "Dames of the Red Petticoat," whose clamourings Carlyle likened to the screams of the furies.

"I give Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman just 18 months," she shouted in a speech to the dock labourers of the West Ham division of London, when announcement was made of the election of "Will" Thorne, the Socialist, for whose triumph she had worked early and late for a month. The horny handed sons of toil unharnessed the horse from the tradesman's wagon at whose tailboard she harangued them and drew the vehicle around the division, going without their suppers—and their beer too—that night in order to show her their gratitude.

"Men, my brothers. Men, the workers"—that was the way she spoke to them. "Don't let the aristocrats buy you off. Stand to your guns. Be independent of the so-called ruling class. Never lose sight of the end as to which you and I and all Socialistic thinkers and workers are agreed—the feeding and maintenance of children by the state."

Her audience roared its approval and Lady Warwick—still remembered among a certain set as "Babbling Brooke"—laughed prettily in return. She greatly offended some of the social leaders of the "upper ten" by her satirical allusion to their methods of electioneering, but they had laid themselves open to her sharp thrusts. For instance, Mrs. "Lulu" Harcourt, who canvassed for the Liberals, went into a neighbourhood densely crowded with labouring men and invited all to a big luncheon of muffins and cakes! The Countess of Warwick had fine sport with this trick. "Oh, you working men of England," she cried, "will you let a woman bamboozle you with the contents of a bakery? Is that all there is in the Liberal platform—cakes and muffins? Oh, muffins, muffins, muffins! What crimes are committed in your name!" As Lady Warwick is a practiced elocutionist and has a far-carrying voice, this attack proved highly damaging to Liberal sentiment in West Ham. She heard that Consuelo Vanderbilt, Duchess of Marlborough, was campaigning for the Unionists and Tories—for the fiscal reformers and Chamberlainites—in an automobile and taking the car down into the most squalid districts of London.

"Now, look, at our American duchess!" she exclaimed. "She is the daughter of one of the richest men in the world. She could buy up any parish at the East End and not feel the loss in her bank account. She goes around for votes in a motor car that cost not a shilling less than five thousand pounds—the price of the chariot of Croesus, and she expects to get a vote every time she gives a labouring man a ride."

"Comrades and friends in the glorious cause of emancipation of labour, will you be gulled by such arts? Will you give up your rights because a slender vision in an automobile veil comes to take a drop of tea with your wives and to lug you off to the polls at one vote per ride? Shame on you! The motor car will prove a juggernaut; whether you ride in it or lie under it is all the same."

THE EARTHQUAKE.

Prof. Omori, speaking through the Japan Times, states that it is improbable that any great earthquake will occur in Japan this year. A great earthquake generally occurs after some year when the number of earthquakes has been small. In 1904 there were 155 earthquakes in Tokyo, and in 1905 the number was 154. There have been years when Tokyo had only 32, 46 or 50 earthquakes. The frequent occurrence of earthquakes in the last two years, tends, so to speak, to preserve the normal state or "health" of the earth, the tremors acting as a sort of safety valve to ease terrestrial disturbances. The earthquake of Saturday was not a very severe one. Its maximum horizontal motion was only 9 m.m. Compare this with the earthquake of October 15th, 1882, in which the vibration was 42 m.m., and with that of June 20th, 1894, when the figure was 73 m.m. Compared with those earthquakes this one was quite insignificant.

The earthquake which visited Yokohama and adjacent regions on Saturday was exceptionally severe—far more so than the one of the previous evening, which startled many. It began at 9.14 a.m., and for about a minute shook things up in a most lively manner. Several chimnies were damaged on the Bluff and in the settlement, and in many houses vases and other articles were upset or smashed, but the damage done was trifling considering the severity of the shock.

According to the Yokohama Observatory, the shock commenced at 9.14 a.m. with a slight motion for thirteen seconds, after which it grew severe in both horizontal and vertical motions. When the motions became most severe, the maximum amplitude was 39.09 millimetres per 1.53 seconds. At this stage, an accident happened to the seismological apparatus and consequently no further investigations were possible. The duration of the shock was four minutes and three seconds. The shock was felt from Aomori to Osaka, the centre being Tokyo.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

It is reported by the Jiji that the negotiations of the Tokyo Electric Light Co. and a British syndicate as to the former's proposal for a loan of five hundred thousand pounds sterling were concluded on Feb. 20th and the agreement duly signed. On Wednesday, the Japanese company held a general meeting, at which the contract was submitted to the shareholders. The contract was unanimously approved. The essential terms of the agreement appear to be that interest at 5 per cent. per annum shall be paid, that the actual receipts for the loan shall be £92 per 100; the loan to be redeemed after fifteen years; and the whole of the property of the Japanese company to be taken as guarantee. The company intend to apply the loan to the establishment of an electric station, availing themselves of water-power; when the new works are completed, they also will be offered as security to the creditors.

The Shogyo has a report with reference to the death of Mrs. Walkenstein, wife of Dr. Walkenstein, at Vladivostok, during the late disturbances. The paper says that she was one of the leaders of political agitation and devoted herself to efforts for the attainment of popular government in consequence of which she had been confined in prisons on Saghalien and in other places. At the outbreak of the troubles in Vladivostok, on January 23rd she joined the insurgents as one of their leaders. While so acting she was killed by a shower of bullets discharged by the troops. Her death was profoundly regretted not only by the revolutionaries but by the general public. Funeral rites were performed after the settlement of the disturbance.

No Russian prisoners now remain in Japan. Their repatriation has been accomplished in remarkably quick time considering their enormous numbers (71,963, including 1,438 officers). The first batch left Japan on Nov. 12th from Yokohama; the last (2,800) left Yokkaichi on Feb. 19th by the British steamer Monarch.

Conflicting reports are in circulation as to the whereabouts of General Mischenko who was appointed Commander of Vladivostok after the outbreak of the recent disturbance. The Shogyo declares that it has obtained information from a trustworthy source that General Mischenko arrived at Vladivostok on Feb. 6th and took over the duties from Major-General Altarimoff. The paper adds that previous to his arrival he sent a number of Cossacks from Manchuria to Vladivostok and issued a public proclamation in which he said he sympathized with the bluejackets who had caused the disturbance and intimated that he did not intend to punish them severely.

Professor Paul Harzer, in an address delivered before the students at the Kiel University on the occasion of the Kaiser's birthday, referred at some length to the development of exact sciences in Japan prior to the Restoration. In the Imperial Library, Tokyo, he remarked, there are something like 2,000 written and printed Japanese mathematical works extending as far back as the year 1595; and it is scarcely remarkable that the determination of the "Ludolphian Number" ( $\pi$ ) played a prominent part in the thoughts of early Japanese mathematicians. In 1627 the approximation  $79/23$  was known, while in the second half of the seventeenth century values had been obtained which are correct to 9 or 10 places. The well known value  $355/113$  was known in 1709, and in 1722 and 1739 values correct to 49 and 51 places had been found. Among the early "circle squarers" Kowa Seki (1642-1708) occupied a leading place. His methods, which were applicable to circular arcs generally, depended on successive bisection, but in solving the quadratic equations by means of a series the binomial expansion of the square root was used. During the eighteenth century four series for  $\pi$  were known to Naomaro Ajima, who also dealt with the ellipse. At the beginning of the nineteenth century Enzo Wada was acquainted with the catenary and cycloid, and it now appears proved that Seki and his immediate successors studied the binomial theorem theory of numbers, the properties of maxima and minima, determinants, and spherical trigonometry. Of geodetical observations we have records dating from 1613, and these culminated in the measurement of arcs of the meridian by Ino Chuokei (?) in 1800-1818. On the other hand, even as late as 1895, complaints were made of the neglect of higher mathematical study in Japan. In all probability the ideas of the early Japanese mathematicians were imported from the Occident through the medium of the Dutch.

At a recent meeting of the British Institution of Mining and Metallurgy, held at Burlington House, London, Professor Gowland, in the absence of the author, presented a comprehensive paper by Mr. A. R. Weigall on the subject of gold mining in Japan. The author said that, owing to the small amount and superficial nature of the development yet carried out, little was known about gold mining in Japan, but having spent three years in an examination of gold mining prospects in that country he took a somewhat hopeful view of the future of the industry. The gold producing portions of the Empire were Honshu, Kiushiu, Hokkaido, and Formosa. The alluvial mines were in Hokkaido, but it was in the mining of auriferous deposits other than placers that the bulk of the future supply of Japan might be looked for. In the year 1902 five principal reef districts produced 68,356 oz. of gold. Mine workings of all gradations were to be seen in Japan. The working costs for the best managed plant the author had seen in Japan were 11s. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per ton crushed, mining costing 3s. 9d., and milling 3s. 10d. per ton. An abundant supply of mining labour at a low rate of pay was ensured, and he was of opinion that the Japanese miner was the best labourer at his price in the world. The average daily wages of men and women engaged in mining gold ores in 1902 were—men 10.056d., and women 4.632d. The Japanese made good surveyors and assayers. The requirements of the mining authorities were not exacting, and the area of land allowed to be taken up ranged from 2 $\frac{1}{2}$  acres to 500 acres. The total gold production of the Empire, including Formosa, during recent years had been:—1900, 80,161 oz.; 1901, 113,122 oz.; and 1902, 143,993 oz.

Few persons have any idea of the phenomenal growth of the manufacture of electrical apparatus in the United States. In 1905 it amounted to $217,000,000, as compared with $175,000,000 in 1904, a gain of $41,500,000, or 23 per cent. As might have been expected, the largest single item was for motors. Their output in 1905 aggregated $42,000,000. Insulated wires and cables were a close second, with $40,000,000; telephone apparatus, $37,000,000, which was a gain of 25 per cent. over 1904. The earnings of the various corporations furnishing electrical communication, transportation and illumination in the United States amounted to about $720,000,000 in 1905, an increase of $100,000,000 over the preceding year. The following table gives a good idea of the growth of the trade:

Telegraph and cable cos...	$45,000,000	$40,000,000
Telephone companies.....	140,000,000	110,000,000

Shipowners throughout the Empire (excepting the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, etc.) held a meeting on Feb. 23rd at the Kaibo-ro in Osaka. They decided to form a union and to organize a limited association. The vessels owned by the shipowners of the western provinces aggregate eighty thousand tons and those in eastern waters fifty thousand tons.

The Government has introduced into the Diet a bill for reducing the size of the 50 sen and 20 sen silver pieces now in circulation. These coins being in effect mere tokens there is no reason why they should not be made as small as convenience dictates. At present if one is so unfortunate as to receive at a railway station or a post office change for a five yen note in half-yen pieces, one finds oneself bound with an unwieldy weight of metal. The inconvenience of the subsidiary coins has been specially felt since the introduction of the gold standard, for the smallest denomination of the latter (apart from the one-yen gold coin which is too small to be safely used), was such that people were perforce obliged to carry a large quantity of subsidiary coins, especially as notes of smaller denomination were withdrawn from circulation. Minting of subsidiary coins left a large margin of profit to the Government and this constituted one of the specially designed assets under the new system. The public, however, protested a great deal against the inconvenience of these heavy silver coins, though they long ago ceased to protest either because custom reconciles men to any grievance or because they have become hopeless of redress. The Government, however, is now meeting the situation by a measure which might, one thinks, have been taken long ago. The fifty sen piece of the future will measure 9/10 of an inch in diameter whereas the present coin measures 1.02 inch, and will weigh only 10.1250 grams against 13.4783 grams. The 20 sen piece will be correspondingly reduced from a diameter of 0.74 inches to .967 inches and from a weight of 5.3914 grams to 4.0500 grams. The 10 sen piece will not be altered as to size but will become somewhat lighter. There are about 50 million yen worth of 50 sen and 20 sen in circulation and consequently the changes now contemplated will bring to the Treasury a profit of about 16 million yen.

Vice-Admiral Sir Arthur William Moore, the successor of Admiral Sir Gerard Noel as Commander of the British squadron in China waters, arrived at Hongkong on Feb. 13th in the British warship King Alfred. The Fiji reports that the Hogue, Sutlej, Andromeda, and Bonaventure will shortly return home.

An Otaru telegram says that two freight trains on the Hokkaido Colliery Railway collided at 10 p.m. on Feb. 24th with the result that two cars were smashed and a brakeman was killed.

The recent bestowal by H. M. the King of England of the Order of Merit on three most distinguished Japanese warriors reminds the Yorodzu Choho of the very poor reward the Japanese Government is accustomed to give to men outside of military and naval circles who have rendered great services. The Order of Merit is worn by 15 Englishmen, of whom only 6 are soldiers; the rest are either great men of letters, artists or scientists, such as Mr. John Morley, Sir Alma Tadema and Lord Kelvin. In Japan it is only soldiers who are honoured with such high distinction. No literary men and artists have ever been decorated, while though a few men of science have been, yet the Orders they have received are of a much inferior rank. For instance, Dr. Shiga, the well-known bacteriologist, was recently decorated with the Sixth Order of the Rising Sun—an honour which is usually given to a sub-lieutenant of unknown fame. Can the great service rendered by Dr. Shiga in the scientific field be adequately compared, remarks our contemporary, with the merit of a sub-lieutenant who may have led a company of soldiers on the battle-field?

The Asahi publishes a story describing the devotion and loyalty of a soldier of the Eighth Division. Among those who fell into the hands of the Russians at Heikautai, on Jan. 28th last year, was Shibata Urakichi, who had been badly wounded in the foot during a night attack upon a portion of the Russian right wing. He was taken to the Harbin Hospital, where he found three of his comrades who, being also wounded, had likewise been captured. They agreed that after they had recovered sufficiently they would escape from custody and then attack the Russian headquarters by setting the building on fire. They were then, if successful in this part of the scheme, to cut the telegraph and telephone lines between headquarters and the various Russian armies. But their plans were upset by the intimation on March 23rd that they were to be transferred to Russia, and they were at once removed from hospital and put on board a train. Seeing all his hopes blasted, Shibata, when the train was near Hishovania, obtained possession of a loaded rifle belonging to one of the guards (all of whom were drunk or engaged in card-playing) and, retiring to the lavatory, shot himself in the throat. To his comrades, who were attracted to the place by the shot, he merely said he wished death rather than consignment to the enemy's country as a prisoner. Then with a banzai to the Emperor he passed away.

The death is announced of Vice-Admiral Viscount Ito (Sukemaro), which occurred in Tokyo. Deceased was born in August, 1835, in Kagoshima. During the war of the Restoration he was Vice-Commander of the Kasuga and in 1870 was promoted Lieut.-Commander. The following year saw him reach the rank of Commander. He participated in the affairs of the Satsuma Rebellion and the Saga trouble, after which the Emperor decorated him with the First Class of the Rising Sun. In 1878 the distinguished officer was promoted to the rank of Vice-Admiral. From 1880 to 1884 he was Director of the Bureau of War Affairs and President of the Naval College, and in 1890 he was appointed a member of the Upper House and at the same time Grand Attendant in the Kinkei Hall of the Imperial Palace.

On the 26th inst. during the public trial of Mr. Kono Hironaka and the others who with him are charged with inciting a Tokyo mob to violence on the night of the 5th of September a curious incident occurred. One of the accused, by name Yoshizawa, when questioned in open court gave evidence diametrically opposed to his testimony at the magisterial enquiry. The court was full of barristers representing the accused. They numbered 150 and occupied so much space that very little room remained for spectators. The bench, immediately on hearing Mr. Yoshizawa's evidence, called attention to the glaring discrepancy between his present and his previous statements. He admitted the discrepancy, but declined to give any intelligible explanation of it. Finally the judges agreed to clear the court and hold a session in camera in order that Yoshizawa might be induced to tell the truth. The result is of course unknown, but all sorts of conjectures are published by the press, the least injurious being that Yoshizawa, though he took part in the riot, was in reality a detective in the pay of the police. This, it will be observed, does not at all account for his sudden volte face, and we observe with some surprise that certain of our Tokyo contemporaries appear to attach importance to the ultimate statements of a man who by deliberate perjury, has proved himself unworthy of all credence.

There is in the press and will be published early in March, by the Kanasahi Publishing House, Tokyo, another little work on Bushido, entitled "Bushido in the Past and in the Present." The writer is Rev. John Toshimichi Imai, an old pupil of the late Archdeacon Shaw, and long associated with the English Church Mission at S. Andrew's, Shiba. Mr. Imai has twice visited England and is well known to many of the leaders in the English Church, numbering among his other friends Bishop Gore of Birmingham. It was, we believe, in response to requests made to him from England for further light on Bushido that Mr. Imai set himself to the task he has now fulfilled. We may expect good things in the book, and it will no doubt be especially welcome to those who desire to see Bushido sympathetically treated from the Christian standpoint.

"NIOBE" IN KOBE.

"Niobe," as played by Kobe amateurs, seems to have greatly delighted a large audience at the Gymnasium last Friday. The players were Mrs. McWilliams, Mrs. W. King, Mrs. F. Harrold, Miss Atkinson, Miss Penney, Mr. C. Crowther, Mr. W. G. Feast, Mr. S. Wheeler, and Mr. G. J. Penney. The lady who writes under the thinly veiled pseudonym of "Santa Sophia," tells the Kobe Herald all about the frocks which were worn. She says:—Mrs. McWilliams, in the title role, wore a Greek robe which fell in graceful statuesque folds, girdled by heavy cord. The second costume was an elaborate tea-gown of pale yellow over white accordion pleated gauze; the over dress was bordered with pale green leaves embroidered in a darker shade, the same trimming finishing the long "angel" sleeves. Mrs. King, as "Helen," wore in the first act black chiffon cut very primly in full accordance with the character represented. She changed to a dark grey silk walking costume, trimmed with turquoise blue velvet medallions and vest. A word of praise must be given to this lady's "make-up," for it is not often one sees an amateur so willing to sacrifice her looks for the sake of artistic effect. Mrs. Harrold's evening dress was of pink silk veiled with cream lace, and in the second act she wore pale blue with a white embroidered vest. Miss Crowther's white muslin with its innumerable little frills was fitting foil for the elish school girl she so charmingly portrayed. Miss Atkinson looked bewitching in cream lace and even more so in a dark red with white embroidered vest, and one could understand and share in "Corney's" infatuation. Miss Merrilees, as "Madeline Mifton," was a stately figure clad in a stylish travelling costume of deep crushed strawberry tint, trimmed with a darker shade of velvet, with a hat to match. Miss Penney's get up as "Mary" was absolutely correct in every detail.

DINNER AT THE AMERICAN LEGATION.

In honour of Viscount Aoki (recently appointed Ambassador to Washington) and Viscountess Aoki a dinner was given on Friday evening by Mr. Huntington Wilson, American Chargé d'Affaires, and Mrs. Wilson, at the Legation in Tokyo.

The guests included:—Admiral Saito, Minister of the Navy, and Mme. Saito; H.E. Mr. Hara, Minister of Home Affairs; Viscount Inaba, Bishop Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Shugio, Mr. Lynch, Mr. and Mrs. B. C. Howard, Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Blake, Mr. A. M. Knapp, Prof. E. W. and Mrs. Clement, Rev. D. C. and Mrs. Greene, Mr. H. Satoh, Mr. John B. Gibbs, Mr. Geo. H. Scidmore.

The menu was as follows:—

Oyster cocktails
Crème de tomate
Saumon bouilli, sœ. verte
Jambon de Virginie, sœ. Cumberland, Epimards
Choux-fleurs, sœ. mousseline
Faisan roti, bread sauce, Petit pois
Croustades au parmesan, salade
Glace caramel

After Mr. Huntington Wilson had proposed the health of the guests of honour, Viscount Aoki replied with a brief acknowledgment of the general expression of goodwill.

REACTION IN CHINA.

THERE are two prominent features of the reaction in China, one of them the reaction itself, which is not at all strange, the other the view taken by certain foreign critics, which is exceedingly strange. It is not at all strange that the Chinese should have grown intolerably impatient of the domineering treatment to which they have been subjected by foreign Powers for more than a century. That may seem a hard thing to say, and so it is from certain points of view. The foreign representative or the foreign consul stationed in China has found himself again and again, nay, habitually confronted by conditions which cannot be apparently reconciled with any theory of Chinese reasonableness. In short he finds himself entangled in the vicious circle which, having had its remote origin in Western aggression, has travelled on through Chinese resentment to foreign retaliation, and thence back again over the same weary route. He discovers no way of emerging from that circle, and being perpetually tied to it by the law of like to like he adds his quota to the unhappy series of events and naturally resents the notion that any other course was possible. It is in fact a case of an evil groove in which the feet of foreigner and Chinaman alike are fastened, but the fact remains that the Chinaman's struggles to reach a higher and juster plane of international treatment deserve the sympathy of all humane onlookers, terribly perplexing as such struggles must be to civilized statesmen. All that, we say, is plain enough, neither strange nor puzzling. But what are we to say for the singular theory enunciated by some extremely wise foreign observers namely, that Japan is egging China on in this matter and is inciting her to conduct an anti-foreign crusade. It is simply not conceivable that any of the analysts who throw this kind of dust into public eyes can have wasted a moment's serious reflection on the problem. For with what explicable object could the Japanese pursue such a course? Japan, judged by her modern career, can scarcely be set down as a weakling and no hypothesis short of her absolute idiocy would account for the attitude thus assigned to her. If she be urging China to make the Middle Kingdom an intolerable abode for all foreigners, her own people will be equally included in the inevitable exodus. If she be prompting China to defy the world, to deprive foreign life and property of all safeguards, the lives and properties of her own subjects will be equally insecure. It is not a case of China for the Chinese and Japanese, but of China for the Chinese only. What sort of mad vertigo could betray Japan into a suicidal mania of this kind? The Nichi Nichi Shinbun shrewdly observes that if China herself paused to think, she would hold her hand. For by what means was she originally compelled to make the concessions and grant the privileges which she is now burning to recover? Was it not precisely by acts of lawlessness and violence which in foreign hands became weapons of exaction? In fact in order to cut down the crop of troubles that have grown out of her own errors in the past China is about to sow a new crop with precisely the same seed. Doubtless if the Chinese took that sensible view of the situation the voices now clamouring for riken kaifuku would soon sink into silence. But Chinese exasperation seems for the moment to have broken down the barriers of Chinese reason, solid a quality as the latter has always proved itself. The Japanese at all events may be acquitted of the imbecility of egging poor single-handed China to leap into the arena of armed nations. It is not the perdition of China that Japan seeks to compass but her preservation, and we hold that there can be no more pestilential perversers of present history than those who, blinded by their own racial prejudices, read into the acts of every Oriental nation the most hateful and the least rational motives.

THE TAX ON BUILDING LANDS.

MUCH difference of opinion appears to be caused by the Government's new Bill with regard to the re-assessment of building land. The provisions of the measure have been pretty fully explained in these columns. We now read in Tokyo journals that the political parties are greatly divided in their attitude towards the question. The Seiyu-kai are said to be tolerably unanimous, though even in their ranks some dissenters are found. But the Progressists are split into two distinct camps, and so are the Daido and the Seiko Clubs, so that the fate of the Bill is very problematical.

At present, under the War-tax system, owners of urban building lands pay 20 per cent. of the assessed value of the land and owners of rural building lands pay 8 per cent. The Government's view is that the proposed method of re-assessment would not increase this burden but would merely correct the inequalities which now disfigure the incidence of the tax. That forecast is not universally endorsed, however. A member of committee in the Lower House has calculated that whereas the revenue at present derived from this tax is 16 million yen, it would be 25 millions under the new system. That would mean an addition of over 50 per cent. to the present burden and naturally in the face of such a possibility there are calls for fuller investigations, and for postponing the bill until next session. The Tokyo City Assembly is said to have calculated that whereas the Treasury's proposal to multiply by ten the present assessed value and take the product as the new basis of taxation, would not increase the burden on landholders in the Nihonbashi, Kanda, Asakusa, Shiba and Kyobashi districts, the payments required from the inhabitants of the other ten districts forming the city would receive an addition of 1,580,000 yen. It is scarcely to be supposed that this estimate is entirely erroneous, yet how can we otherwise credit the statement attributed to the Treasury that the new method would not make any material difference to the tax-payer? The Keizai Zasshi writes very clearly on the subject. It supports the measure, regarding it as a proper method of placing the building-land's tax on a basis which shall be not only fair by comparison, but shall also permanently include the increased rate arising out of the war. But the Keizai does not admit that individual tax-payers will not be sensibly affected. The general fiscal outcome may not be altered materially, but the individual land-owner will find his dues augmented or diminished. We (Japan Mail) do not clearly follow this argument, for the Keizai says that to multiply the assessed value of urban building lands by 8 and that of rural building lands by 3-2 would leave the present collection unaffected. The Government, however, takes the multiplier 10 for maximum, and consequently the final result may be a very sensible augmentation of the levy.

"IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN."

ONE of the foremost poets of the Nineteenth Century declared that the saddest words in the English language are, "It might have been." Human experience in every age bears him out in his sorrowful dictum. All through the long drawn vistas of history this bitter cry has risen, time and again, to the lips of men and women of every degree, and it will be so, we fear, until the last sentence comes to be written in the very last chapter of the Book of Life. A historical study entitled "The Wives of Henry the Eighth and the Parts they Played in History," which comes from the pen of Major MARTIN HUME, and which has just been published by Mr. EVELEIGH NASH, of London, might well have printed these words as its text. HENRY VIII. played no inconsiderable part in the work of the English Reformation and he has found defenders and detractors in every century since he paid the last great debt of Nature. FROUDE, his warmest admirer, undoubtedly plied the white-wash brush too freely, though he certainly did obtain a clearer insight into many of HENRY's motives than did some of his biographers. It was inevitable that such a man living in such an age—the "seething time" as one imaginative writer describes it—should engage the attention of historical critics, and it is also inevitable that approaching him from so many different points of view they should find the KING's character reflected in as many different facets. Major HUME, who has devoted the best part of his literary life to investigating subjects dealing with the Tudors, presents HENRY in a somewhat different light to some of his dissectors. He writes of him as he sees him, the central figure of the politico-religious turmoil of the sixteenth century:—

"I regard Henry himself (says Major Hume) not as the far-seeing statesman he is so often depicted for us, sternly resolved from the first to free his country from the yoke of Rome, and pressing forward through a lifetime with his eyes firmly fixed upon the goal of England's religious freedom; but rather as a weak, vain, boastful man, the plaything of his passions, which were artfully made use of by rival parties to forward religious and political ends in the struggle of giants that ended in the Reformation."

This strikes the keynote of the book, and in dealing with the sad story of HENRY's wives he follows out his train of argument without undue deviation from the central line of observation. The Spectator, in a review of the volume, says that it would be rather curious to speculate what kind of history England might have had if the question of European alliances had not made young HENRY's marriage with his brother's widow, KATHERINE, politically advisable, and if the Spanish Princess had been sent back, as at one time seemed likely, to Spain. Or again, if KATHARINE had borne a son to succeed his father, or if she had been a woman of more tact and prudence and of less stateliness, so that she could have condescended to those arts which might have managed HENRY and kept his worthless affection; how then, with no irritated KING, no greedy CROMWELL, or time-serving CRANMER, would the Reformation have fared in England? No EDWARD VI., no "great ELIZA's golden time"! The speculation, though profitless now after nearly four hundred years, opens up a vista which possesses boundless attractions, for thoughtful folks cannot help but agree that if the POPE had not been forced by CHARLES V. to oppose HENRY as to the divorce from KATHARINE—the EMPEROR being not at all moved by kindness for his ill-used aunt, but by the fear of a French marriage for HENRY, so anxiously planned by the deceived and miscalculating WOLSEY—means would have been found to prevent any violent separation between England and Rome. But then so many things hang upon that if. If LUTHER had received different treatment at Worms; if the Stuarts had been able to deal honourably with men and women; if GEORGE WASHINGTON had succumbed to the rigours of his early backwoodsman wars with the frontier Indians and the French; if NAPOLEON the Third had not been an invalid in 1870—well, the history of the world would have been very different and the sum of human happiness perhaps might not have risen to quite so high a level as it stands at the present hour.

THE TSAR AND HIS COSSACKS.

THE Cossacks deserve well of the TSAR. But for them the recent troubles in the great centres of population, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kiev, Odessa, Vladivostock and the Livonian towns, would have been far longer prolonged, though perhaps the outcome would have made far less disheartening to western onlookers. The ruthless methods of the Cossacks cowed the mob and the autocracy of the TSAR weathered the storm. Ever since IVAN the Terrible conquered the Khanates of Kazan and Astrakhan during the years 1552-54, the Cossacks who inhabited the lands drained by the Dnieper, Don, Volga, and Ural have been a weapon of offence and defence ever ready to the hand of the TSAR. Though they were Russian by origin, language and sympathy the habit of kidnapping Tartar women introduced among the Cossacks a certain admixture of blood which has tinged very considerably their outlook on life. As to their political status, in the days of their first absorption into the Russian empire, it cannot be easily defined. While professing allegiance and devotion to the TSAR they did not think it necessary to obey him, except in so far as his orders suited their own convenience. And, as Sir DONALD MACKENZIE WALLACE points out, the TSAR acted towards them in similar fashion. When he found it convenient he called them his faithful subjects, and when complaints were made to him about their raids on Turkish territory, he declared that they were not his subjects, but runaways and brigands, and that the SULTAN might punish them as he thought fit. At the same time, the so-called runaways and brigands regularly received supplies and ammunition from Moscow. Down to the middle of the 17th century the Cossacks of the Dnieper stood in a similar relation to the Polish Kings: then they threw off their allegiance and entered the pay of the TSARS of Muscovy. These Cossacks of the Dnieper lived by fishing, hunting and marauding and knew nothing of discipline, except in war time. The utmost equality reigned in their fortified camps, and the common saying, "Bear patiently, Cossack, you will one day be Ataman," was often realised, for every year the office bearers laid down the insignia of office in presence of the general assembly and after thanking the brotherhood for the honour they had enjoyed retired to their former position of common Cossack. The Cossacks of the Don, Volga and Ural were somewhat different in organisation; having no fortified camp they assembled only when necessity demanded. In WALLACE's "Russia" we read that these military communities rendered valuable service to the empire of the TSAR:—

The best means of protecting the southern frontier was to have as allies a large body of men leading the same kind of life and capable of carrying on the same kind of warfare as the nomadic marauders; and such a body of men were the Free Cossacks. The sentiment of self-preservation and the desire of booty kept them constantly on the alert. By sending out small parties in all directions, by "procuring tongues"—that is to say, by kidnapping and torturing straggling Tartars with a view to extracting information from them—and by keeping spies in the enemy's territory, they were generally apprised beforehand of any intended incursion. When danger threatened, the ordinary precautions were redoubled. Day and night patrols kept watch at the points where the enemy was expected; as soon as sure signs of his approach were discovered, a pile of tarred barrels prepared for the purpose was fired to give the alarm. Rapidly the signal was repeated at one point of observation after another, and by this primitive system of telegraphy in the course of a few hours the whole district was up in arms. If the invaders were not too numerous, they were at once attacked and driven back. If they could not be successfully resisted, they were allowed to pass; but a troop of Cossacks was sent to pillage their aouls in their absence, whilst another and larger force was collected, in order to intercept them when they were returning home laden with booty.

Notwithstanding these valuable services, the Cossack communities were a constant source of diplomatic difficulties and political dangers. As they paid very little attention to the orders of the Government, they supplied the Sultan with any number of casus belli, and were often ready to turn their arms against the power to which they professed allegiance.

The Government naturally strove to put an end to this danger, and ultimately succeeded. All the Cossacks were deprived of their independence, but the fate of the various communities was different. Those of the Volga were transferred to the Terek, where they had abundant occupation in guarding the frontier against the incursions of the Eastern Caucasian tribes. The Zaporovians held tenaciously to their "Dnieper liberties," and resisted all interference, till they were forcibly disbanded in the time of Catherine II. The majority of them fled to Turkey, where some of their descendants are still to be found, and the remainder were settled on the Kubán, where they could lead their old life by carrying on an irregular warfare with the tribes of the Western Caucasus. Since the capture of Shamyl and the pacification of the Caucasus, this Cossack population of the Kubán and the Terek, extending in an unbroken line from the Sea of Azof to the Caspian, have been able to turn their attention to peaceful pursuits, and now raise large quantities of wheat for exportation; but they still retain their martial bearing, and some of them regret the good old times when a brush with the Circassians was an ordinary occurrence and the work of tilling the soil was often diversified with a more exciting kind of occupation.

The Cossacks of the Ural and the Don have been allowed to remain in their old homes, but they have been deprived of their independence and self-government, and their social organisation has been completely changed. The boisterous popular assemblies which formerly decided all public affairs have been abolished, and the custom of choosing the Ataman and other office-bearers by popular election has been replaced by a system of regular promotion, according to rules elaborated in St. Petersburg. The officers and their families now compose a kind of hereditary aristocracy, which has succeeded in appropriating, by means of Imperial grants, a large portion of the land which was formerly common property.

As the Empire expanded in Asia, the system of protecting the frontier by Cossack colonists was extended eastwards, so that now there is a belt of Cossack territory stretching almost without interruption from the banks of the Don to the coast of the Pacific. It is divided into eleven sections, in each of which is settled a Cossack corps with a separate administration.

When universal military service was introduced in 1873, the Cossacks were brought under the new law; but in order to preserve their military traditions and habits they were allowed to retain, with certain modifications, their old organisation, rights and privileges. In return for a large amount of fertile land and exemption from direct taxation, they have to equip themselves at their own expense, and serve for twenty years, of which three are spent in preparatory training, twelve in the active army, and five in the reserve. This system gives to the army a contingent of about 330,000 men—divided into 890 squadrons and 108 infantry companies—with 236 guns.

It goes without saying that the Cossacks look upon themselves as the most valuable troops in the TSAR's service, and carry themselves accordingly. Their record during the Japan-Russo War does not bear out their boast, though some military critics contend that they had no opportunity of displaying their qualities, save in the one instance, when MISCHENKO made his famous cavalry raid to Yingkow. The matter of the Cossack land, which the TSAR has been asked to settle by a system of restoration, has been a burning question among them for many generations. Originally the Cossacks were not allowed to take up agricultural pursuits; they were a pastoral people and their assemblies tried to keep them so. But gradually the more progressive among them began to sow wheat and the area of corn-land very quickly extended. Then came about a change which altered the old conditions very materially. The more methodical families increased in wealth and the lazy and improvident went under in the struggle, till at last the best parts of the Cossack lands became the private property of certain families, and the land-less Cossack became merely an agricultural labourer, without any share in the communal lands. It is to redress this grievance, to divide up the land among every member of the Horde, as in the olden days, that the Cossacks are now petitioning their TSAR.

IMPERIAL DIET.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers had quite an exceptional field-day yesterday (23rd instant), when the Bill for a National Debts Adjustment Fund and that for continuing the war taxes came up for discussion. The former measure was passed without difficulty, but against the second were found arranged the whole of the habitual malcontents, led by Viscounts Tani and Soga. Viscount Soga moved an amendment limiting the time of the Bill's operation but the House rejected it, and finally, after the debate had lasted from 10 a.m. until 3 p.m., less the usual mid-day recess, the Bill was adopted. Thus all the serious financial problems may now be said to have been disposed of.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1.05 p.m. on Feb 22nd. The Order of the Day was as follows:—

- 1.—First reading of a Government bill regarding the abolition of the tax on Exchequer Bonds on Stock Exchanges.
- 2.—Continued first reading of the Government bill regarding the settlement of the special financial measures connected with the late extraordinary affair.
- 3.—Continued first reading of a representation regarding exemption from taxes in distressed districts.
- 4.—First reading of a representation regarding the revision of city organization.
- 5.—First reading of a private bill regarding the revision of the street and village organizations.
- 6.—A private bill regarding the abolition of the Tokyo Metropolitan Police Office.
- 7.—A private bill regarding the establishing of an institute for investigating insanity.
- 8.—Report by the Chairman of a Special Committee on a petition for exempting from taxes agricultural land and 193 other matters.
- 9.—Report by the Chairman of a Special Committee on a petition exempting import duty on cocoons.
- 10.—Report by the Chairman of a Special Committee on a petition lowering the customs duties and revising the customs management for examining cargo.

The Bill relating to the settlement of the war expenditures was passed, but the 1st bill on the Order was handed to a special committee.

The representation regarding the exemption of famine areas from certain taxes was accepted and a bill passed.

A warm debate arose on Mr. Shun-ichi Ewa's representation for abolishing the Metropolitan Police Office for Tokyo, but on the vote being taken it was lost by 175 to 100.

The House rose at 5.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10 a.m. on Monday Feb. 26, Prince Tokugawa, President of the House, in the chair.

The bill relating to the judicature in Korea, already described by us, was explained by Mr. Okano, Director of the Legislative Bureau. The measure is intended to transfer to Residencies powers hitherto exercised by Consulates.

A bill for amending the Currency Law, a bill for concluding the special account of the war expenditure, and a bill for the remission of land taxes in the famine districts were referred to special committees.

A Representation introduced by Mr. Mayeda, which urged the Government to organize a special investigation committee with regard to post-bellum enterprises, was opposed by Viscount Soga and rejected by the House.

The special committee of the Peers, Feb. 27th, adopted the bill exempting the famine stricken districts from land tax.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at a few minutes past one on the 27th instant and proceeded to deal with the following Bills:—

- 1.—Government Bill (sent down from the Peers) for amending a part of the Civil Code (vide Japan Mail on February 6th).
- 2.—Second Reading of a Government Bill for remitting all taxes upon Exchange transactions in public securities.

The object of this Bill is to facilitate time transactions in Government Loan Bonds.

- 3.—Second Reading of a Private Bill for interdicting the use of alcoholic liquors by youths under twenty.
- 4.—Second Reading of a Private Bill for amending Law No. 13 of 1896.

The object of this Bill is to extend to teachers in Kindergartens the same treatment and the same pensions as are enjoyed by teachers in Primary Schools.

- 5.—Second Reading of a Private Bill for amending a part of the Railway Law.

This measure is intended to procure for school teachers the privilege of travelling by railway at half fares when they are engaged in school business.

- 6.—Second Reading of a Private Bill for amending the Law of Finance (vide Japan Mail January 26th).
- 7.—Private Bill for amending the Law of Jurisdiction of Courts of Justice.

The object of this Bill is to render the practice more uniform with regard to the trial of crimes of theft.

- 8.—Representation with regard to establishing a College for the Investigation of Diseases of the Brain, there being at present no special provision of this sort in Japan.
- 9.—Representation for restoring the embankments of the Tonegawa.

The above were treated as follows:—

No. 1 having been reported favourably by a special Committee was passed through its Second and Third Readings.

No. 2 was similarly treated.

Nos. 3, 4 and 5 were debated en bloc. The Special Committee suggested certain amendments of (3) and (4) but recommended (5) as it stood. The Government Delegate was understood to signify approval of (3) and (4), but to oppose (5). Mr. Mitsui contended that (3) was a wholly impractical measure, similar legislation had been tried with regard to tobacco and had failed signally. The Second Reading was rejected.

A closed ballot was taken in the case of (4) when 214 voted against, and 166 for. Thus the Bill was rejected.

Before (5) was put to the vote, Mr. Yamano-uchi, Chief of the Railway Bureau, set forth in detail the Government's objections to the Bill and it was thrown out.

Nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9 were handed to Special Committees and after hearing the Report of the Petitions Committee, the House rose at 2.45 p.m.

The House met at a few minutes past one on the 1st instant. The order of the day was as follows:—

- 1.—Government Bill sent down from the Upper House for amending the law of Industrial Bills (vide the Japan Mail 19th of February); the amendments proposed are of a trifling character and are dictated by the development of these guilds.
- 2.—Second reading of Government Bill seeking post-facto approval of Imperial Ordinance No. 194 of 1905. This ordinance authorized the raising of a foreign loan of three hundred million sterling in England, America, and Germany.
- 3.—Private Bill for amending the law relating to grants of land to local militia-men. Framers of this bill claim that the law of local Militia having been abolished these regulations are now superfluous and even injurious.
- 4 and 5.—Private Bills for amending the regulations with regard to granting medical diplomas. The presenters of the Bills take the ground that the present law having been enacted in 1883 is no longer suited to the time. They propose that men who have graduated at the Medical College of the Imperial University, or at special Medical Colleges, as well as men who have been graduated at foreign Medical Colleges, satisfy the Educational Department of their competence, by passing examination, shall all be considered equally qualified for diplomas. One of the Bills takes even broader ground but the details need not be given here.

- 6.—Representation relating to the development of national resources (vide the Japan Mail 9th Feb.)
- 7.—Representation relating to the relief of sufferers by famine in the three north-eastern prefectures. The document claims that the latest investigations show the number of persons in need of aid in the three prefectures to be as follows:—

Miyagi .....	442,202
Fukushima .....	364,791
Iwate .....	190,422
Total .....	997,415

The Representation urges that a supplementary budget providing for the relief of these persons should be at once presented to the Diet.

8. and 9.—Representations relating to riverine improvements.

The first of the above measures was handed to a special committee. The second led to considerable discussion. The Government delegate explained to the Budget Committee that there had not been time to summon a special session of the Diet as the American capitalists would have left New York for the summer in the interval. This reason did not at all satisfy the Progressists' members, who contended that the time for the American capitalists to leave New York had been known from the first and the Government ought to have taken measures accordingly. A question arose as to whether the House should supplement its consent by a warning against any repetition of such irregularities. Out of 299 members present 177 voted in favour of unconditional consent and 122 voted in favour of adding a condition. Nos. 3, 4, and 5 were handed to committees. No. 6 was passed with slight amendments as was also No. 7. Nos. 8 and 9 were handed to the same committee and the House rose at 3.35 p.m.

Secretary and Hon. Treasurer, and to the Auditor.

The hospital ship Hakuai Maru has been released from service. She will be re-employed on the N.Y.K. Shanghai line.

L'ALLIANCE FRANCAISE.

At the meeting of the Alliance Francaise held in the Van Schaick Hall on Monday afternoon, M. J. de Cuers de Cogolin, President, in the chair, there was a good attendance.

The first part consisted of a paper entitled "Chateaubriand: Œuvres complètes." Mons. Edmond Baron outlined the life and travels of the great Christian author, whose influence has been so very considerable upon the religious feelings of his fellow countrymen and also on French literature. Chateaubriand, it may be said, reconciled France and Catholicism and opened the way to the romantic movement. "Atala" and "Les Natchez," due to his sojourn amongst the Indians of America, "le génie du Christianisme" "le dernier des Abencérages," "les Martyrs et les Mémoires d'outre-tombe," are so full of touching passages that the lecturer might have given more quotations from the works than he did; but M. Baron, who was making his first speech in public, felt at the moment that he had already spoken a little too long—an altogether mistaken impression so far as his audience were concerned. The second part of his lecture likewise suffered from being somewhat curtailed. However, the subject was so elevating and so appealing to the minds of many present that when he left the platform he received a hearty outburst of applause, well rewarding him for his trouble and the time he had spent in research.

The second part comprised five numbers, all of which were rendered with great acceptance. Perhaps most notable was No. 5 in which Madame Schmid, Messieurs Saenger and Schmid took part, the lady singing the vocal part, and Mr. Jamin giving the recitation, with Messrs. Saenger (whom we should greatly like to hear in solo) at the piano and Mr. Schmidt at the cello. To illustrate the ballad we reproduce the words, explaining that the parts italicised were rendered by Madame Schmidt and the words in roman type were recited by M. Jamin:—

LA BALLADE DU DESEPERE

Qui frappe à ma porte à cette heure ?
—Ouvre, c'est moi.—Quel est ton nom ?
On n'entre pas dans ma demeure
A minuit ainsi sans façon !

Ouvre.—Ton nom ?—La neige tombe ;
Ouvre.—Ton nom ?—Vite ouvre-moi
—Quel est ton nom ?—Ah ! dans sa tombe
Un cadavre n'a pas plus froid.

J'ai marché toute la journée
De l'ouest à l'est, du sud au nord.
A l'angle de la cheminée,
Laisse-moi m'asseoir.—Pas encor.

Quel est ton nom ?—Je suis la gloire,
Je mène à l'immortalité.
—Passe, fantôme dérisoire !
—Donne-moi l'hospitalité.

Je suis l'amour et la jeunesse.
Ces deux belles maîtresses de Dieu.
—Passe ton chemin ! ma maîtresse
Depuis longtemps m'a dit adieu.

—Je suis l'art et la poésie,
On me proscriit ; vite, ouvre.—Non !
Je ne sais plus chanter ma mie,
Je ne sais même plus son nom.

—Ouvre-moi je suis la richesse,
Et j'ai de l'or, de l'or toujours ;
Je puis te rendre ta maîtresse,
—Peux-tu me rendre nos amours ?

—Ouvre-moi, je suis la puissance,
J'ai la pourpre.—Vœux superflus !
Peux-tu me rendre l'existence
De ceux qui ne reviendront plus ?

—Si tu ne veux ouvrir ta porte
Qu'à un voyageur qui dit son nom,
Je suis la Mort ! ouvre ; j'apporte
Pour tous les maux la guérison.

Tu peux entendre à ma ceinture
Sonner les clefs des noirs caveaux ;
J'habiterai la Sépulture,
De l'insulte des animaux.

Entre chez moi, maigre étrangère,
Et pardonne à ma pauvreté.
C'est le foyer de la misère
Qui t'offre l'hospitalité.

Entre, je suis las de la vie,
Qui pour moi n'a plus d'avenir ;
J'avais depuis longtemps l'envie,
Non le courage de mourir.

Entre sous mon toit, bois et mange,
Dors, et, quand tu t'éveilleras,
Pour payer ton écot, cher ange,
Dans tes bras tu m'emporteras.

Je t'attendais, je veux te suivre,
Où tu m'emmenas—j'irai ;
Mais laisse mon pauvre chien vivre
Pour que je puisse être pleuré.

UNIFICATION OF JAPAN METHODISM.

The progress of Christian Missions in the Japanese Empire has been such during the last decade that it seemed wise to bring the several Methodist bodies now working in that empire into closer relation. This conviction, in the interest of unity, economy, and increased efficiency, led the representative missionaries and Japanese ministers of the six Methodist Churches in that field to the favourable consideration of organic union.

This question was submitted to the General Conference of at least four of the Methodist Churches represented in Japan, with the result that commissions were appointed by the respective Churches, and clothed with power to act when these commissions should be called together.

On the third of January, 1906, there met at Mount Vernon Place Methodist Church, in Baltimore, Md., commissions representing the following churches :

The Methodist Church in Canada : Commissioners—Rev. A. Carman, D.D. ; Rev. A. Sutherland, D.D. ; Rev. William Boggs, D.D. ; Hon. Justice MacLaren, LL.D. ; H. H. Fudger, Esq.

The Methodist Episcopal Church : Commissioners—Bishop Earl Cranston, D.D. ; Rev. A. B. Leonard, D.D. ; Rev. C. W. Smith, D.D. ; Lemuel Skidmore, Esq. ; Charles Z. Lincoln, Esq.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, South : Commissioners—Bishop A. W. Wilson, D.D. ; Bishop Charles B. Galloway, D.D. ; Rev. James Atkins, D.D. ; Rev. T. T. Fishburn ; Rev. W. R. Lambuth, D.D.

The Methodist Protestant Church : Commissioners—Rev. W. L. Wells, D.D. ; Rev. F. C. Klein ; Mr. S. R. Harris ; Rev. T. J. Ogburn ; Rev. F. F. Brierly.

Rev. G. D. Gossard, of the United Brethren in Christ, was present, but, in the absence of specific action by the General Conference of said Church, declined to take part in the deliberations.

The Evangelical Association of America not having been notified in time, no representative was present.

Two days of prayerful and painstaking consideration were given to the question before said commissioners, but not being able to reach definite and final conclusions, it was decided to adjourn subject to the call of the four presidents of the four Methodist bodies represented—Rev. A. Carman, D.D., Toronto, Canada ; Bishop Earl Cranston, D.D., Washington, D.C. ; Bishop A. W. Wilson, D.D., Baltimore, Md. ; Rev. T. J. Ogburn, D.D., Baltimore, Maryland.

All of the commissioners present were deeply impressed with the momentous issues involved, and devoutly desired to reach such a basis as should bring the Methodist Churches of Japan, which are already in hearty co-operation, into organic union.

W. R. LAMBUTH,
Secretaries.

THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

The Order of the Garter is the most ancient and the most noble order of Knighthood in Europe or the world. It dates, at least, from 1348, and perhaps from four years earlier.

The buckled Garter or band was adopted by King Edward III., as a Badge in 1347. By this symbol, in which the Buckle was always emphasized (it was sometimes even taken by the King as a separate badge by itself) he designed, as it were, to bind and buckle the Knights or Fellows of his Order severally unto one another, and all of them jointly to himself, as Sovereign of the Order.

"It being most just that those whom equal Virtue and Fortitude of mind had joined together, no fortune should separate or estrange by occasion of any accident or difference." Accordingly, the motto embroidered on the band was "Honi soit qui mal y pense." "Scorned or disgraced be he that thinks ill of such a bond," who thinks lightly of it, plots against or breaks the promise of fealty and allegiance to the head or to the members of such a noble brotherhood. Hence it was for long the custom that when any Prince or magnate who had been admitted into the Order found himself afterwards compelled to break the bond, or take up arms against the King of England, he first returned with all honour the Order into the Sovereign's hands, that so he might be free of his oath of Knightly friendship and union.

The Mantle or Cloak, as designed by the Founder, was of blue cloth powdered with Garters, or sometimes with the Arms of St. George embroidered upon the left shoulder. This latter form has survived until this day. The Mantle is now made of dark blue velvet, and is worn only by the Knights in State Processions and Feasts of the Order.

The Collar, with its links and knots, was designed by Henry VIII., with the same intent and symbolism as the Garter, namely, "As witness of the bond and tie of Faith, Peace, and Amity to be strictly observed among the Society of the Garter, wherein they ought to be united in all chances of Fortune, Co-partners both in Peace and War, assistants to one another in all serious and dangerous transactions, and through the whole course of their lives friendly and faithful towards each other." The Tudor Rose, consisting of the White Rose of York and the Red Rose of Lancaster in one flower was inserted in the Collar, betokening thereby the marriage of his father Henry VII. with Elizabeth of York, and as a further symbol of Union, and that the rivalry of the two Royal houses and their several adherents should henceforth cease, and both should be as one in the bonds of friendly fellowship.

The Arms of the Order of the Garter bear a blood-red cross upon a white or silver field, and these are set within a Star with silver rays. The blood-red cross is the Christian symbol that self-sacrifice is the root of all Virtue and Life. The rays of the Star betoken that it is heaven sent to illumine the hearts of men.

The George and Dragon, which is attached as a pendant to this Collar, was the favourite device by which, in Europe, after the period of the Crusades, the contest between Light and Darkness, Right and Wrong, was symbolized under the form of a youthful warrior contending with the loathly spirit of ill. It is naturally the same as was embodied in the story of Perseus and the sea monster slain by him at Joppa, on the shores of Palestine, when he delivered Andromeda. The Black Book of Windsor preserves the legend of the appearance in vision of St. George, the youthful warrior, to Richard I. at Iydda, near the same place, where a Crusader-built church still stands over his reputed tomb. The youth of this legend was said to have been born there, and martyred as a Christian in the Diocletian persecution. He was first formally adopted as the National and Patron Saint of the soldiery of England by the Synod of Oxford in 1222 A.D.

CONSIDER THE LILIES.

[Miriam Loquens.]

Oh, in the pauses of the way,
When to the soul comes space for thought,
Before the heart the past is brought,
With burdens, trials, sorrow fraught,
And joys that sang like birds in May.

We sigh to think the years are flown
With all their wealth, of joy and grief,
Their precious friendships, fond and brief;
Yet may we hold the glad belief
They have not come and gone, alone.

Our years grow richer as they fly.
Nay, all the moons have brought of good,
Of gentle joy and sorrow rude,
In childhood, girlhood, womanhood,
Is with us yet, and cannot die.

The lily, as the ripples part,
Sighs not to feel the waters flow;
But gathers beauty as they go,
And fairer shine her cheeks of snow,
And richer glows her golden heart.

So from the pauseless stream of time
We gather strength for lives of truth,
And age may nobler be than youth,
The spirit, like a patient Ruth,
Come laden from a golden prime.

THE "NIKKO MARU"

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's fine steamer Nikko Maru, which has now been put upon the Company's Australian line, for which she was originally built, was opened to inspection as she lay alongside the Pier on Thursday afternoon previous to her departure for Australian ports on Saturday the 3rd instant. We understand that nearly a thousand invitations had been issued by the Company's manager at Yokohama and the popular Commander of the vessel, Capt. E. W. Haswell, and these were fully appreciated as the bright, sunny afternoon, after the preceding three days rain and sleet, offered every inducement to visitors to take advantage of the Company's hospitality. Mr. K. Nagai, the local Manager, and Captain Haswell, assisted by various other officials of the Company, most courteously received the numerous guests during the afternoon and put them in the way of getting a good view of the fine vessel and her accommodation, while refreshments of all kinds were served on the upper deck, the smoking rooms and second class saloon. The illustrated card given by the hosts to visitors to the Nikko Maru gives the following particulars of the vessel:—gross tonnage 5,539 tons, length 430.7 ft., breadth 49.1 ft., depth 27 ft., class 100 A.I. at Lloyds; passenger accommodation, 90 first class, 24 second, 24 intermediate, 105 third class; cargo capacity 4,000 tons dead weight, coal capacity 1,450 tons; speed 17.7 knots, I.H.P. 6,694; boilers, 2 double ended and 2 single ended, triple expansion, engines, electric light all through, 4 therm. tanks. The Nikko Maru was built by the Mitsu Bishi Dockyard and Engine Works in 1903 and coming up to Yokohama was put on the berth for Australia on Jan. 16th, 1904, but before she started was taken over by the Government for purposes of the war, and is only now resuming the service for which she was originally intended. When describing the ship on her arrival at Yokohama we gave the following account of her fitting and furnishing on Dec. 28, 1903, and though during her service through the war some of her internal arrangements were changed, these have since been restored under the fostering care of Capt. Haswell to their original condition.

The Nikko Maru has a straight stem and elliptical stern; she is divided into eight water-tight compartments and is constructed with double bottom right forward and aft. There are two complete decks; upper and main. The bridge deck, which extends for a length of 175 ft., is sheltered by the shade deck and reserved for the first class passengers' promenade, while the poop deck is for the second class.

The decorations of the first class, saloon social hall and smoking room are most elaborate and artistic. For example, we read in our Nagasaki contemporary that the chief decorative feature of the saloon is a square-trunk skylight which rises to the height of 21 ft. from the saloon floor and is 10 ft. square. The upper part of the skylight is of rich stained-glass. In the forward end of the saloon there are two large wireless-cloisonne panels worked in the wall; one panel representing wild ducks in water, and the other wild ducks in flight; these are by Mr. Namikawa, a member of the Imperial Household artisans, and famous for his wireless-cloisonne ware. Aft of the saloon is the grand stairway, panelled also in white oak and similar finish to the saloon, giving access to the first class cabins on the upper deck. It is lighted overhead by a large skylight of stained glass, as well as from the sides. The centre-panel is a large cut silk velvet, with a magnificent picture of a water-fall in black and white, prepared by Mr. Iida of Kyoto. The social hall is at the forward end of the saloon, the walls lined with white oak and finished similar to the saloon; there are three silk panels with classic pictures of Mount Arashi woven in silk gobelin-fabric. The hall is furnished with piano, writing desks, and a number of easy and occasional chairs. It will not be amiss to add here that this social hall was fitted up at the Osaka Exhibition and was used by their Imperial Majesties the Emperor and Empress as a retiring-room during their visit. The furniture is in peacock blue with classic bamboo and florapawllonia design in silk damask. All the fabrics are by Mr. Kawashima, a well-known silk-weaver and a member of the Imperial Household artisans, to the builders' design.

The ship is equipped with the very latest appliances in the matter of boat gear, deck machinery, electric lighting (there are no fewer than 500 lamps on board, exclusive of ten cargo lights each of 250 candle power), heating and cooling, (the Nikko is the second as the Kumano was the first vessel under the Japanese flag to carry Stewart's thermo-tank system), ice making, and refrigeration. The triple expansion engines drove the new craft on her trial at a speed of 17.76 knots.

THE LAW COURTS.

PETITION FOR DEPRIVATION OF PARENTAL RIGHTS.

The case in which Mr. Jules Dubois petitions for the deprivation of the parental rights of Mrs. Julia Dubois came up again on Feb. 23rd in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nagata.

At the outset of the hearing of this case plaintiff's Counsel produced the Swiss Civil Code, and a translation of several articles of the law which, it is alleged, have connection with the present case. Defendant's Counsel refused to admit them as evidence in the case.

Plaintiff's counsel asked the Court for leave to examine Sugiura, a merchant of Motomachi, and T. Midzuno, of Tokyo, as witnesses. Counsel said that Mrs. Dubois had sold valuable goods, referred to at the previous hearings, without obtaining consent from the administrator of the deceased's estate. Midzuno had been one of the acquaintances of the late Mr. Dubois for twenty years past. Consequently he knew the habits of the defendant well.

The Court decided to summon the person mentioned as a witness.

Dr. Paul Ritter, Swiss Consul-General, was again examined. The essential point of his statement was that the defendant had sold the articles from property left by the deceased and received yen 5,852. By the further sale of the remainder of the goods, she realised yen 932.25. Witness further stated that she received five hundred yen from Mr. Favre-Brandt of Osaka and not from Mr. J. Favre-Brandt of Yokohama. He was told by Mr. Favre-Brandt, of Osaka, that the latter had received the amount from Mrs. Dubois for safekeeping.

At this stage, the Court adjourned till March 22nd.

NEARY v. GEORGE.

The hearing of the case instituted by Mr. J.

Neary, No. 185, claiming sixty-seven yen and twenty-one sen from Mrs. George, No. 106, was resumed on Feb. 23rd in the Yokohama Local Court before Judge Aoyagi.

A jinrikisha coolie named Osawa was examined as a witness after which the case was again adjourned.

The case in which Mr. J. Neary, No. 185, claims yen 67.21 from Mrs. George, No. 106, came up again on Feb. 26th in the Yokohama Local Court, when judgment was given. Judge Aoyagi ordered defendant to pay plaintiff the amount claimed and to bear costs.

CLAIM ON CHIP-BRAID.

The case instituted by R. Tanaka, a chip-braid merchant, against Messrs. Carlowitz & Co., No. 3, Yamashita-cho, claiming yen 696.83 and interest at 6 per cent. from November last till the execution of judgment, came up on Feb. 27th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nakanishi.

Plaintiff was represented Mr. T. Yasumura and the defendants by Mr. R. Ideura.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that from Sept. 25th to Oct. 31st his client supplied to the defendants chip braid valued at the sum claimed. The agreement as to payment was that payment should be made at the end of September and October. Defendants, however, did not settle although plaintiff often urged them to do so.

Defendants' Counsel briefly stated that the firm did not make any contract with the Japanese merchant for the purchase of material. Neither did they receive delivery of the chip-braid.

Plaintiff's Counsel produced several letters as evidence and said that one (Exhibit A-1) was a contract signed by a representative of the firm, and the others (Exhibits A. 2-6) were receipts for materials delivered.

Defendants' counsel refused recognition of the evidence, and said that the German firm made a contract with a third person but not with the plaintiff. With regard to the evidence produced by the plaintiff, defendants' Counsel said that he would make enquiry of his clients and would afterwards give a definite reply. He asked the Court to adjourn the hearing. The Court consented and adjourned the case till March 13th.

CLAIM ON SHORT-DELIVERY OF CARGO.

In the Yokohama District Court, the hearing of a case in which Messrs. Mendelson Bros. claim twelve hundred yen from the Ocean Steamship Co., and the China Mutual Steam Navigation Co., whose Yokohama agents are Messrs. Butterfield & Swire, was resumed on Feb. 27th before Judge Nakanishi.

Referring to the invoices (Exhibits A. 3-4) for tin plates brought by the Kaisow and Diomed, the plaintiff's Counsel dilated upon the size and weight of the material which was alleged by the defendants' Counsel to be lying loose in the bonded warehouse of the Yokohama Customs and which was personally examined on Feb. 2nd by the Judges at the request of the plaintiffs. Plaintiff's Counsel further produced two documents (Exhibits A. 5-6) and stated that Messrs W. M. Strachan and Co. No. 71 were one of the consignees of the tin-plates brought by the Kaisow. One hundred cases were consigned to them. This firm, however, received seventy cases only. When Messrs. Strachan and Co. asked Messrs. Butterfield and Swire for the shortage, the latter replied that thirty cases had been broken during the voyage of the steamer but that the contents were stored in the bonded warehouse. The goods referred too by the defendants were in the identical pile of tinplates which Messrs. Butterfield and Swire were contending had been consigned to Messrs.

Mendelson Bros. These was safely stored in the warehouse. Plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine Mr. H. C. Gulland, manager of the International Banking Corporation, a Chinese employee, named Chun Hai Phong, of Messrs. W. M. Strachan & Co., and K. Kobayashi, one of the Japanese tallymen employed by Capt. Weston, as witnesses.

At this stage the parties discussed the responsibility of the shipowner, after which the Court decided to summon the foregoing men as witnesses on March 13th.

S. KAMITOKU v. MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE AND COMMERCE.

In the Administrative Litigation Court, judgment has been delivered in the case instituted by S. Kamitoku, a farmer, representing the villagers of Meiki, Akita prefecture, against the Minister for Agriculture and Commerce. The decision was in favour of the plaintiff. It may be noted that the villagers asked the authorities to affirm that a portion of the forest, 40 cho (one cho, about 2½ acres) near the village belonged to the villagers. The Minister of the Department dismissed the petition and ruled that the whole of the forest belonged to the State.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

His statement was very lengthy and referred principally to the Portsmouth Treaty. Mr. K. Sakurai was next examined after which addresses were made by the lawyers appearing for the defence. The trial was then adjourned till March 5th.

THE "HABUTAYE" QUESTION.

The Yokohama Chamber of Commerce held a meeting at 1 p.m. on Feb. 26th to discuss the habutaye bleaching bill, which has been submitted by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce to the Upper House. The meeting thought that the bill, if passed, would impede the development of the habutaye industry.

The habutaye manufacturers of Kanazawa, who recently resolved to oppose the habutaye bleaching bill, presented on Feb. 22nd petitions to the Presidents of both Houses and the Chairman of the special committee in the Upper House, asking them to dismiss the project.

On the Rock Island route recently a big bald eagle flew so close to an engine hauling the Rock Mountain Limited that the fireman was able to grab it, its balance being overcome by the suction of the machine. He pulled the bird into the cab and after a hard fight made him a prisoner, but not without receiving painful wounds.

Miss Alice Roosevelt's marriage was the tenth wedding held in the White House. The first to occur was that of Miss Todd, of Philadelphia, a cousin of Mrs. Madison, in the winter of 1811. The bridegroom was a young member of Congress, John G. Jackson, of Virginia, who became later the great-uncle of Stonewall Jackson.

A Manila cable to the Japan Advertiser dated San Francisco, February 27, says that Mr. David B. Henderson, former Speaker of the House of Representatives, is dead. Captain A. O. Tonkay, commonly known as "Huckleberry Finn," and said to be the original of Mark Twain's famous character in the story "Tom Sawyer," was found dead in his room at Murray, Idaho, on February 2nd, from heart failure. Captain Tonkay was a native of Hannibal, Mo., and was 65 years of age. In early life he ran on Mississippi and Missouri river steamboats, and came in frequent contact with Twain, and tradition has it the author later used Tonkay as his model for "Huckleberry Finn."

Never before the death of Marshall Field have we read or heard of a man, so rich and related to so many interests and so many people, of whom not a breath is spoken in disparagement. He was the incarnation of integrity and conscience. An evidence of this comes to light in the scrupulousness with which he refused ever to allow his business to be advertised in Sunday newspapers. Even when other merchants swarmed in the Sunday papers, he maintained his conscientious scruples till the end.—Central Christian Advocate.

At New York last month Captain William H. Van Schaick was found guilty of criminal negligence in failing to have fire drills on the steamship General Slocum, which he commanded in June, 1904, when the steamship burned with the loss of more than 1,000 lives. Knapp lives at Bente Harbor, Mich., where he has been working as carpenter and cabinet-maker since he was graduated from Haskell Institute, the Government school in Kansas. His mother is a granddaughter of the famous Pottawatomie chief, Simon Pokegon, and his father, a white man, was a soldier in the Civil War. Knapp seems to have got the appointment by his own exertions. He wrote to Indian Commissioner Leupp, saying he desired to get a military education and narrating the main facts of his life. Leupp wrote to his employers. They replied recommending him in strong terms. The Commissioner took the matter to the President and urged him to recognize an Indian who showed an ambition to make the best of himself. The President acted promptly.

"This country to-day is like a boy who has inherited a big fortune and is living on it without earning anything himself," said Mr. James J. Hill, who returned to New York from the West on Jan. 29. "It is all very well to talk about our great prosperity, but we are spending what has been earned, not what we are earning now. We are using up our capital and have become an extravagant nation." Mr. Hill, in referring to American trade with the Orient, took occasion to remark that America was not getting her full share of it. He said that Great Britain was far ahead of America. In this connection, he pointed out that American purchases from Japan last year were $50,000,000, whereas, the purchases of that country from America aggregated only $26,000,000. He added, however, that the balance of American trade with oriental countries should show improvement from now on.

The estate of the late Charles Lockhart of Pittsburg was one of the largest in the world. The New Allegheny County Board of Tax Revision has made this discovery in spite of efforts made to keep the real size of the estate from any one. The County Board of Revision has received from the manager of the estate of the oil king a statement which has not been made public, but it is admitted that the Lockhart estate is close to the $100,000,000 mark. Mrs. W. S. Flower, the daughter who was cut off with an income of $300,000 for life by her angry father because she married a poor dentist, has not, according to her attorneys settled the case, though it has been said she is offered $30,000,000, or about her full share, if she will agree not to try and open up the estate by litigation. The Lockhart estate has, according to the accountants in the Tax Revision office, increased almost $10,000,000 in value since the death of Rockefeller's former partner.

Public education in the schools of New York State cost last year $41,064,842, an increase of $3,329,905 over the preceding year. For teachers' salaries there was paid the sum of $23,084,218, which was $1,104,831 more than that expended in the year before. For buildings, sites and repairs there was expended $10,984,565, an increase of $2,321,999, and for libraries $172,976, a decrease of $38,024, as compared with the preceding year. The average per capita cost of education has increased. Last year it was $33.45 per pupil, which was $2.30 more than the year before. The value of elementary school buildings and grounds is put at $105,572,576, an increase of $13,124,317. There is a wide disproportion between the values of school buildings in cities and of those in districts outside of cities. In cities the average value is $91,330.91; in districts outside the cities $1,833.63. There were employed in the public elementary schools 32,886 teachers, an increase of 697, at an average annual salary of $701.94 and an average weekly one of $19.94.

SCHOOL FOR FOREIGN CHILDREN, TOKYO.

The Committee appointed by the Standing Committee of Cooperating Christian Missions on Jan. 17, 1906, to visit the School for Foreign Children, Tokyo, respectfully report as follows:—

We visited the school on Jan. 18 and made a careful examination of its conditions and needs. We were highly pleased to observe the life and energy displayed by both teachers and pupils and the happy relations which exist in the school. We were surprised at what was being done in spite of inconvenient accommodations and insufficient equipment.* We were especially pleased to find that the necessity of having many "mother-teachers" to give each a little time to teaching several branches is gradually disappearing; and that the development of the school warrants the employment of several regular, experienced instructors, who are devoting their time and strength entirely to the work of the school. And, while we cannot withhold our appreciation of the efforts of the "mother-teachers," who started the school and made possible its present efficiency, we are glad to learn that it is the desire of those who have the institution in charge to eliminate as rapidly as possible the temporary elements and employ more professional talent. And there is a special need just now of a capable English teacher for reading, grammar, rhetoric, elocution and literature, which are divided among several temporary teachers, but, at least in the advanced classes, should be brought into unity under one instructor.

We cannot refrain from reiterating with still greater emphasis the need of permanent quarters, not only for recitation-rooms, but also for boarding accommodations. The present quarters are used through the generosity of three different Mission Boards, but cannot always be available, nor are they suitable for such purposes. At any rate, the school is hindered from carrying out many plans for development, which are possible only in more suitable and permanent quarters. The attendance of about 100 pupils from all parts of Japan shows the need of the school and proves that it is no longer an experiment but a necessity in the life of Japan. There are also inquiries concerning the school from Korea, China and the Philippines. But the attendance has already reached the limit of the present accommodations, so that expansion is impossible, unless better quarters are secured at once. Already students have been turned away on account of the lack of boarding and lodging accommodations. A good dormitory, in charge of an efficient matron, with a large number of boarders might also render it possible to diminish the cost of board, which some now find a burden. Large, bright and airy recitation-rooms, with a good playground for both sport and calisthenics† and a suitable dormitory are the prime need at present.

And this school supplies such an unsectarian and cosmopolitan want that its needs should commend it to the consideration of broad-minded philanthropists. To found a model institution of learning in the metropolis of the leading nation of the Far East might reasonably satisfy an ideal of philanthropy. Such a school, with proper buildings, a home, a home-like dormitory, a spacious playground, an efficient faculty, and perhaps also an endowment fund, to render it secure against fluctuations in tuition-fees (which might then be lowered), would be a magnificent object-lesson of both real philanthropy and true education.

There is one more thing to be said. The school needs the sympathy of the foreign residents. It includes among its pupils English, Scotch, Canadians, Americans, Germans, Japanese, Siamese and others. The methods of education of all these may be quite different and difficult to harmonize. But it is necessary to cultivate a catholic spirit; to realize that teachers and students are doing their very best under great difficulties and disadvantages, and deserve sympathy and encouragement. Therefore, we should all pull together and thus have a hand in making this school, what it should be and can be, a model institution, with the best methods of education, providing the greatest good to the greatest number.

AN OUTCOME OF THE FAMINE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR.—You will no doubt be aware that districts visited by a famine or other disaster causing much suffering have, in the past, been successful recruiting grounds for those interested in supplying inmates for the Licensed Quarters. The present famine in the North appears to be no exception and we learn, from the Newspapers and other sources, that large numbers of girls are being secured for immoral purposes by the payment of small sums. The girls, owing to the distressed and suffering condition of their friends, are willing to sacrifice their virtue and happiness, so as to be able to render some temporary help to their friends and relieve them of the burden of their support.

The following is from the Kahoku Shinbun and speaks for itself:—

"Taking advantage of the suffering, despair and anxiety in the Districts affected by the Famine, a large number of unscrupulous persons from Tokyo, Osaka, and other places, who earn their living by trading in unfortunate girls for immoral purposes, are making a raid and securing a large number of girls. These people are very skilful in deceiving the girls and their parents, saying: 'Our only desire is to help the poor people of these Districts. We could get plenty of girls in Shinshu, and other places but we are anxious at this time to help this part of the country rather than other places.' So saying they deceive these people and get the girls for sums ranging from 5 to 10 yen, at the lowest, and 30 to 40 yen in exceptional cases.

"When we remember the condition of many of these poor people, who know that unless they get help from somewhere, they must starve to death, we can understand their willingness to sacrifice themselves for the sake of their parents. But what a future for these poor things! From one village alone, called Kamigun, from 40 to 50 girls have been secured and shipped off to Manchuria, where they are forced into an evil life. What a pity that some other way cannot be found to prevent the starvation of those families, without the necessity for the sacrifice of these girls."

While these girls are thus being secured for this purpose, there is a great demand both in Tokyo, and in Yokohama, for female servants. An evidence of the need in this direction is the fact that our Labour Bureau, though only recently established, has applications for nearly 50 on the Register, which cannot be supplied. Situations can therefore be found for these girls which will enable them to provide for their own maintenance, and also render some assistance to their friends, without the sacrifice of their honour.

It will interest your readers to know that, with the co-operation and help of friends in sympathy with this practical work of relief and prevention, we are sending Officers to the Famine area, so that, with the aid of Government Officials, the Famine Relief Committees, and others, they may be able to get hold of and rescue some of these girls. We propose to bring them to Tokyo, where we have opened a Servants Home, into which they can be received and remain while they are fitted up with the necessary clothing, and suitable situations are provided for them.

The Railway Authorities have very kindly agreed to convey the girls, and the Officers engaged in this work, at greatly reduced rates.

This plan, which combines prevention with relief, will involve a considerable expenditure, though it will be done as economically as possible.

Yours sincerely, HENRY BULLARD, Colonel.

February 21, 1906.

Donations for the above mentioned purpose should be sent to Col. Bullard, 3 Shibaguchi, Nichome, Tokyo.

ACKNOWLEDGING FAMINE GIFTS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR.—Among the many generous givers to the Famine Fund there are some who emphatically prefer that their names should not be known, and we mean to be careful to follow such instructions. We regret that one such name was published in our list of Feb. 10th, and shall take care that such a mistake does not occur again. In another case a very generous gift came with only the signature "A.B." We sent the usual receipt, but the letter was returned with the Post Office mark "Insufficiently addressed." The donor very properly writes for a receipt but still gives no other address than "A.B." As it is useless to remail his receipt, may I ask your kind aid in letting all donors know that in every case a receipt has been promptly sent, and if any others have not received them, we beg that they send us full addresses with requests for the proper receipt. "A.B." with all others was published in the Feb. 10th list.

Sincerely yours,

J. H. DE FOREST,
One of the Committee.

THE GARTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR.—Unparalleled in the world's history, and certainly so in the records of the East, is the honour which we have just received from the greatest of the earthly powers. Wonderful are the merits, no doubt, that have ensured this honour; wonderful, the wisdom and sentiment that have so appreciated these merits as to confer upon them this very honour; and still more wonderful are the care, precaution, and delicacy with which the sacred token of honour is given and received. Yet nothing is amiss in all this: the worthy merits now find their reward in the worthy honour.

The Order of the Garter, whatever its historical origin may be, is doubtless a sign of chivalrous virtues. He who lacks piety, valour, or veracity, is not entitled to receive it, and much less to bestow it upon others. Thus no nation on earth is more fit than the English to confer it; and no nation is more deserving than we are to accept it.

Yano Fumio, an old friend of mine, told me, many years ago, this little incident that took place while he was in the States. On being asked, one day, by a distinguished scholar and statesman what his professed religion was, Mr. Yano answered him abruptly, saying that he believed in no religion—mushukyo. Then he astounded him by adding to the effect that Japanese gentlemen, as a rule, seldom trouble themselves with religious matters, most of them being like him, mushukyo. On this the American statesman exclaimed: "Then, how can your country stand?" Shaku Genkyo, the wonderful, heroic priest, told me a few days ago that the very appellation which we give to our country, Shinshin, or the country of gods, is the root of all superstitions, and consequently no nation on earth is more infested than we, by never ending varieties of religion, many of which are not worthy of reverence. Better call Japan, Sumeramikuni, or the country of our Emperor, and all the superstitions vanish.

They are both right; and at the same time they are both wrong. Right, because they reflect the truths which he who runs may easily read. Wrong, because they do not pause to read those truths a little deeper. If religion or piety means ostentatious formalities of worship and nothing else, then our educated class, with but a small exception, has hardly any religion whatever. But if calm resignation at the will of Heaven, deep sympathy towards his fellow-beings, and disinterested love for what is just and what is beautiful, together with that profound fidelity towards his Emperor, parents, and friends, which makes one ready to lay down his life for their sake, as well as that meekness in the hour of triumph and prosperity, and that magnanimity, condescension, and kindness towards his rivals or foes, especially when they are helpless, form religion, then, I must say, we Japanese are a religious people. We do not lack piety in every sense of the term.

Shido (which is a better and older term than bushido) is the living tenets written in every Japanese heart. Whatever may be their professed form of religion, or if they profess no religion at all, the Japanese, with perhaps a small exception, acknowledge an exalted Entity, whom the ignorant call Ten-to-sama while the educated, Ten or Tenri. No phrase is commoner than Ten-mei, Ten-batsu, or Myoga, in our community at large. Thus Japan has one universal or national faith which is Shido, and believes in one Entity who is no less a being than God himself. We have been called all manner of names, pagan, heathen, and so forth. All these are quite true, but such truths lie on the surface, it is, so to speak, but skin-deep. Our blood, no less than our faith, is pure and noble although we are not too proud to try to make them still nobler and better.

England, as the superficial observers imagine, has not joined hands with a mere pagan nation. She knows better than that. The Anglo-Japanese treaty, which surprised the world, is the open declaration of her good faith in our orthodoxy. The offer of the Garter, which may be construed as her generous tribute to our display of Shido, is simply its ratification.

It is more blessed to give than to receive; they, the sons of Britannia, are no doubt rejoicing to-day as much as we are. The unparalleled honour and joy which we now enjoy in accepting the order of the Garter, thus become their unparalleled honour and joy in their very act of its presentation. And we are proud to say that no mean messenger carries to us this instrument of the royal ratification. England's delicacy equals her greatness, and Prince Arthur of Connaught with a dignity becoming his duty and rank, well represents them both. O Prince of Connaught, with what exultation of joy and gratitude do we, a nation of chivalry and honour, welcome thee and thy message! T. T. S.

Yamaguchi, February 21st, 1906.

If the generous editor of the Japan Mail can spare a little more of his valuable space for my clumsy lines, let me sing, or try to sing, here in a few words of broken English, the whole circumstance, as it appears to a spectator, connected with the offer of the Garter to our gracious Emperor.

Hail! mistress of the seas, whom three realms obey.
Whom mighty Thor and Woden their homage pay,
While Neptune yields his faithful trident sure,
Thy praise sung at morning prayers pure,
In one sweet strain of melodious cheers,
Haloes the globe, and enlivens the spheres.

One morn, the sun unusual bright rose
Thine eyes rejoiced to witness him disclose
A saviour of the East, as a bright star
Once infant Jesus disclosed. But lo! afar
An Eagle fierce and th' Dragon, their wings obscure
The skies, him snite, and make him th' shame endure.

Meek as he is with indignation just
The monarch bids his legions rise. The disgust
Jaws of the Dragon, breathing flames and thunders,
Th' fierce talons of the Eagle, tearing numbers,
To death them threat. Then darkness holds the sun—

The light returns—the monsters fall—the day's work!
"Should such exploits of valor, honor'd not, pass."
Thou sayest, "which with Rome's best triumphs class?"

As gentle breath of Spring a bud unfolds
Thy hand the sacred Garter seeks and holds.
Then dost thou tell a prince, brave, wise, and bland,
To take the gift to the chivalrous land.

The land that sees the sunset, never, and
The land that sees the sunrise, ever, bond
In union blent their mutual love-peace
On earth, good will towards men. The space
Pervading th' spheres in joy resounds. Angels sing Jub'lee. Heaven and Earth with carols ring.

But oh! the brave hearts that no longer beat!
Their bones whit'ning strewn in the snow and sleet
Of wild Manchuria! Who would e'er cumber
The lute of Orpheus claim them from th' cold slumber?

—Well may our flowers fall for others' distress,
But oh! the fair bosoms that these flowers bless!

For them no more the weird shouts of banzai rise,
Nor the welcome beams of the sun greet the eyes,
Nor th' gay flowers their gates perfume, since
The other flowers are no more! They wince
And shiver even at their medals of pride;
The lustre cold the Manchuria snow hide!

Never, oh! Never let me war and bloodshed
Hear; never let the bliss of man be inveigled
And trampled gain by monsters that oppress!
The sacred love token of th' sea queen distress
Of mankind heals, before its sores begin
And binds in peaceful union all th' world akin.

O queen of sea, no less of th' wind and land,
Honor to thee who offer'st th' gift to hand,
Honor to him anointed, who the gift
Receives. Honor to him who would not shift
To bring the gift.—The world's jubilee where none shrinks!

"Evil to him alone who evil thinks."

FOR BABY'S SKIN SCALP AND HAIR

Something for Mothers to Think About

EVERY CHILD born into the world with an inherited or early developed tendency to distressing, disfiguring humours of the skin, scalp, and blood, becomes an object of the most tender solicitude, not only because of its suffering but because of the dreadful fear that the disfiguration is to be lifelong and mar its future happiness and prosperity. Hence it becomes the duty of mothers of such afflicted children to acquaint themselves with the best, the purest, and most effective treatment available, viz., THE CUTICURA TREATMENT.

Warm baths with CUTICURA SOAP, to cleanse the skin of crusts and scales and soften the thickened cuticle, gentle anointings with CUTICURA OINTMENT, to instantly allay itching, irritation, and inflammation, and soothe and heal, to be followed in the severer cases by mild doses of CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (see below), to cool and cleanse the blood, are all that can be desired for the alleviation of the suffering of skin-tortured infants and children and the comfort of worn-out, worried mothers. A single set is often sufficient to cure when the best physicians fail.

Millions of Women Use Cuticura Soap

Assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT, for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes, itching, and chafing, in the form of baths for annoying irritations and inflammations, or too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes for ulcerative weaknesses, and for many sanative, antiseptic purposes which readily suggest themselves to women, especially mothers, and for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (Chocolate Coated) are prepared to meet the wants of delicate women, and sensitive children, and are pure, sweet, and tasteless. They are beyond question the most successful blood purifiers and humour cures yet compounded.

CUTICURA REMEDIES are sold throughout the world. Australian Depot: E. Turner & Co., Sydney. British Depot: 37-38, Chancery Lane, London. French Depot: 5 Rue de la Paix, Paris. Forras Bros and Cass, Corp., Sole Props., Boston, U. S. A. "All about the skin," free.

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

On the morning of March 1st, Prince Arthur of Connaught paid a visit to the Kodaiji, (a Buddhist temple), the Gion, the Yasaka-jinsha (a Shinto temple), Maruyama, and Chion-in (a Buddhist temple), and afterwards inspected the fine art department of the Ikeda Goshi Kaisha. At 1.25 p.m. he left Kyoto. The Osaka Asahi presented a flower basket to His Highness upon the platform.

At 2.50 p.m. on March 1st, His Highness reached Osaka. High officers of the Osaka Division, officials of various Government offices and representatives of public bodies welcomed the distinguished visitor on the platform. After staying for a few moments, the Royal train left for Kobe, which was reached at 2.05 p.m. The welcome accorded was very enthusiastic. After a stay of twenty minutes, His Highness left for Himeji, which he passed at 4.40 p.m. Lieut.-General Ando, Commander of the Tenth Division, and staff and other notables welcomed the Prince. The Royal train left after five minutes.

We learn through the Nichi Nichi that His Highness has brought, beside the most noble order of the Garter to His Majesty the Emperor, a letter and autograph photograph from Her Majesty the Queen Alexandra, to be presented to Her Majesty the Empress. When the Prince arrived in Tokyo, the Empress was absent at Numadzu for the sake of her health. As there was no convenient opportunity to see Her Majesty, His Highness handed the letter and photograph to Prince Arisugawa, asking him to present them. On Friday Prince and Princess Arisugawa proceeded to Numadzu, leaving Shimbashi at 7 a.m. and presented the gifts to Her Majesty.

An interesting, if perhaps not wholly accurate, story is going the rounds in Tokyo. In Kyoto Prince Arthur dined at the Miyako Hotel and being presented with a decorated silver dish, apparently designed for the conveyance of sweetmeats, touched the cover, and so liberated a dove and several smaller birds which began to fly about the room. After a few moments the dove took rest upon an artificial pine set in a pot upon the centre of the table, and close by Admiral Togo. The Admiral took up a small fan, which formed part of the table adornments and, endeavoured to stroke the bird with it, but the dove, incontinently fled and thus evaded his attentions. Again the bird approached the table, this time perching upon the staff of a small British flag near General Baron Kuroki. The General, in imitation of Admiral Togo, tried to touch the bird with a fan but with similar lack of success, the dove seeking refuge upon a flower vase in front of Admiral Sir E. H. Seymour who, in his turn, attempted to stroke the visitor and also without effect, as the bird again flew away. Prince Arthur who had watched the proceedings with interest remarked that it seemed to him great soldiers and great sailors found themselves unable to consummate their strategical schemes for the capture of a poor pigeon. The observation, we are told, was received with much laughter—but was it ever really made?

His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught arrived at 6.30 a.m. on March 2nd at Shimonoseki on his way from Kyoto to Kagoshima. He was conducted at once by the Reception Committee to the Sanyo Hotel, being escorted by high officials of the local government offices. After taking breakfast at the hotel, His Highness left at 8.40 a.m.

Subsequently His Highness crossed the strait in the steamer Seki Maru, of the Sanyo Railway Co. Meantime, the cruiser Nitaka, which was specially detailed for the duty, fired salutes and merchantships in the straits were fully decorated. The Prince talked with Admiral Togo in reference to the scenery of the straits and his party were busy photographing the landscape. He landed at the Nanyo pier in Moji, where he was welcomed by Mayor Tashiro and other notables. Amid cheers, he drove to the Moji railway station where Lieut.-General Okubo, Major-General Kagawa, Mr. Sengoku, President of the Kyushu Railway Co., and other distinguished persons were present. At 9.10 a.m., he left by special train on the Kyushu Railway for Sasaho.

The Royal train passed Saga at 1 p.m. stopping for a few minutes. The Governor of Saga prefecture and other officials as well as many representatives of various public bodies met and saw His Highness off at the platform.

At 3 p.m. (on March 2nd), His Highness arrived at Sasaho. When the Royal train neared the town the Yakumo and other warships fired salutes. Admiral Arima, Commander of the Naval Station, and other officers, as well as Governor Arakawa and other officials of the local government, welcomed the Prince. He was at once conducted to the headquarters of the Admiralty and took an hour's rest. At 4 p.m., he proceeded to the Diadem, which had arrived the previous evening from Yokohama, in order to carry him to Kagoshima. After a space of about two hours the cruiser left, being escorted by the Adzuma, Iwate and Otoriva. A flotilla of torpedo-boats saw the Royal warship off to the entrance of the harbour.

The Iwate carried Admiral Togo, Mr. Nagasaki, Court Councillor, Captain Takarabe, Lieut.-Commander Sasaki, etc., and the Adzuma General Baron Kuroki, Colonel Utsunomiya, Captain Yasuhara of the Army, Mr. Asano, Master of the Board of Ceremonies, etc.

It is officially reported that the converted cruiser Manshu Maru on February 26th ran into a severe storm off Wakayama prefecture on her way from Yokohama to Sasaho. She sustained damage to her hull and wireless telegraph apparatus, and lost two boats. Subsequently she took refuge at Hamashima, Shima province, where she will undergo repairs. The Manshu Maru, it had been arranged, was to carry His Highness Prince Arthur and the Imperial Reception Committee from Sasaho to Kagoshima.

The preparations to welcome His Highness Prince Arthur at Kagoshima were most brilliant and the weather fortunately was fine. The Tokisawa and Chihaya were at anchor on the eastern side of the pier and a number of destroyers in the northern part of the harbour. At 9.50 a.m. on March 3rd, the Diadem arrived in the harbour. His Highness subsequently landed. The Lady Toyo Shimadzu, daughter of Prince Shimadzu, Miss Yasu Chigashira, daughter of Governor Chigashira, and Miss Shige Taneda, daughter of Mayor Taneda, presented beautiful flower baskets to him at the pier. Amid loud cheers, His Highness drove to Iso Castle which had been arranged for his accommodation.

On the evening of March 4th, His Highness left Kagoshima for Miyajima in the Diadem.

Telegrams from Kagoshima report that on the afternoon of March 3rd, His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught paid a visit to the Kagoshima branch of the Nippon Red Cross Society. The Kencho presented to him a suit of ancient armour and a pair of Satsuma porcelain vases, and the municipality gave him a pair of swords. Later His Highness was present at a garden party given in his honour. There were given displays of fencing and various other old military accomplishments which he is reported to have greatly admired. In the evening, His Highness was entertained with shibafue, biwa and other music as well as with the tenbuku dancing after dinner. The warships in the harbour displayed illuminations, and several lantern processions were organized in front of Ise castle where the Prince stayed.

On Sunday (March 4th) morning, His Highness was shown fishing with large nets, after which he paid a visit to the tomb of Saigo,—General Saigo Takamori, the leader of the Satsuma Rebellion,—and the Industrial museum. Later he paid a visit to the place where Okubo,—Minister for Home Affairs, assassinated by Cho Rengo,—and Saigo Takamori were born. His Highness planted a tree in commemoration of his visit.

The Prince left Kagoshima at 4 p.m. on Sunday and arrived at Miyajima the following morning.

On Monday, he left Miyajima for Edajima. This morning, he will leave Edajima for Kure Naval Station. Tomorrow, March 7th, he will land at Ujina and proceed to Hiroshima.

His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught arrived at 3.10 p.m. on March 5th at Miyajima from Kagoshima by the cruiser Diadem, being escorted by the Yakumo and Adzuma. The Kasuga and a flotilla of destroyers from the Kure Naval Station met His Highness at the entrance to the harbour. All the Japanese ships were fully dressed and fired salutes. Lieut.-General Kigoshi, Commander of the Hiroshima Division, Governor Yamada and other distinguished persons proceeded to the Diadem and welcomed the Prince. Subsequently, His Highness landed in company with Lord Redesdale and the other members of his suite, Sir Claude Macdonald, the British Ambassador, and the Imperial Reception Committee. He proceeded to the Miyajima Shrine where he was entertained with Shinto dances and music. His Highness also paid a visit to Momijidani, the maple-valley, and took a short rest at the Iwaso hotel. He then returned to the Diadem.

In the evening, despite the heavy sea running, His Highness dined on board the converted cruiser Manshu Maru, which had arrived after having been in a storm off Wakayama Prefecture. At night, launch processions and processions of junks were to be organized, but owing to the rain, these projects were abandoned.

His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught arrived at Edajima at 8 a.m. on March 6th from Miyajima. The warships and transports in the harbour were fully dressed, and the cruiser Idzumo fired a salute. His Highness subsequently landed and proceeded to the Edajima Naval College where Rear-Admiral Tomioka, President of the institution, and the various professors received him at the entrance. His Highness was at once conducted to one of the halls of the college where he gave audience to Prince Tanchito Arisugawa, (a student, the first son of Admiral Prince Arisugawa) and to the President. His Highness visited all the lecture rooms, etc., after which he inspected the class in training. At 11 a.m., His Highness returned to the Diadem and in about half an hour, he left by the converted cruiser Manshu Maru for Kure. At 1.15 p.m. he arrived at Kure under escort of the Yakumo and Otoawa. The Prince was saluted by the Fuji and Asama. His Highness landed and visited the Kure Naval Station. There he was entertained by Admiral Yamanouchi, Commandant of the Station, at a tea party held in his honour. At 4.50 p.m., he left for Ujina.

At Ujina, His Highness gave a dinner on board the Manshu Maru to Lieut.-General Uyeda, Governor Yamada, Mayor Ban, and ten other high officers. In the evening, various lantern processions were organized, fire-works were displayed, and fifty boats illuminated with lanterns moved in procession, being towed by the steamer Hoan Maru.

At 7.30 a.m. on March 7th, His Highness left Ujina for Hiroshima by train.

At a little past nine o'clock on the morning of March 7th, His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught arrived at Hiroshima from Ujina, being escorted by a squadron of cavalry. He was conducted to the East Parade ground of the Hiroshima Division, where he was entertained with military manoeuvres, the troops being under Major-General Surisawa. The troops participating were called the East and West armies. The East Army consisted of three companies of Infantry, one company of Artillery, and one company of Pioneers under Major Chiaki. The West Army consisted of two companies of Infantry with two guns under Major Hirano. The plan of the manoeuvres provided for an attack upon the invaders (West Army) and the occupation of their position, which was defended with wire-entanglements and palisades as well as with mines. At 10 a.m. a trumpeter gave the signal for the commencement of the engagement. From the first, the East Army took the offensive, moving up under cover of rifle fire and subsequently of their guns. The West Army took the necessary defensive measures and the fight gradually grew warm. Owing to having an inferior force of artillery, the West Army were gradually forced back and all of their guns were silenced. Taking advantage of this opportunity, the left wing of the East Army tried to storm the right wing of the enemy by pressing forward in a bayonet charge, which action was repeatedly adopted at the battle of Liaoyang. The attacking force gradually advanced, but when near the parapet defended by wire entanglements and palisades, the mines were simultaneously exploded. The effect was to temporarily stop the advance and the West Army availing themselves of the lull, commenced a counter-attack with rifle-volleys. But their advantage was only temporary. Meanwhile the Pioneers of the East Army advanced to the enemy's wire-entanglements and cut them in the manner learnt at Port Arthur. The audacious enterprise of the Pioneers having been entirely conducted under a shower of bullets from the defenders, casualties were very heavy. Subsequently the usual Japanese tokkan, or hot onset, was sounded, and the position was at length captured. Thereupon a joyous banzai rose from all parts of the field. At the conclusion of the manoeuvres the Major-General commanding gave an explanation of the strategy employed by both armies. His Highness warmly eulogized all who took part in the combat.

His Highness next proceeded to Sentai Castle, belonging to Marquis Asano, which is situated near the Parade ground, and there took a short rest. Marquis Asano and some leading citizens of Hiroshima presented various costly gifts to the Prince, who left at 11.40 a.m. for Ujina. At 1 p.m. His Highness left by the Diadem for Kobe.

THE NATIONALIZATION OF PRIVATE RAILWAYS.

The Hochi says that the Government has decided to purchase the following private railways:—The Hokkaido Colliery, the Hokkai, Nippon, Sanyo, Kyushu, Sobu, Narita, Boso, Kobu, Gan-etsu, Hoku-etsu, Kwansai, Nishinari, Hankaku, Tokushima, Kyoto and Sangu. The valuation adopted in purchasing the railways will be twenty times the profits of the three years, 1902, 1903 and 1904. The cost is estimated at five hundred and forty million yen in round numbers. To obtain the funds needed for purchasing the railways, the Government intends to raise a domestic loan.

The following table shows the estimated value of the private railways proposed to be nationalized.

Railway Company.	Yen.

The grand total aggregates four hundred and seventy million yen in round numbers. It may be added that the length of the railways is 3,172.17 miles; the capital, yen 247,473,609; the expenses needed for construction, yen 258,864,094; the net profits multiplied twenty times as purchase price, as proposed by the Government bill, yen 458,628,925; and materials in stocks belonging to some of the railways, yen 49,017.

The attitude of the various parties in the Lower House with respect to the bill for the State purchase of private railways does not seem to be clearly defined. The Fiji says that, generally speaking, the Seiyu-kai may be regarded as supporters and the Progressists as opponents of the measure, the members of other parties being classified as follows:—

	Supporting. per cent.	Opposing. per cent.
Daido Club.....	60	40
Seiko Club.....	40	60
Members not belonging to any party.....	60	40

The relative strength of the political parties in the House of Representatives may be taken as follows:—

Seiyu-kai.....	141
Progressists.....	96
Daido Club.....	60
Seiko Club.....	26
Unaffiliated.....	56

Some of the previously unaffiliated members are now included in the ranks of the Daido Club.

From the foregoing tables it will be seen that approximately the numbers for and against the bill are as follows:—

	Supporters.	Opposers.
Seiyu-kai.....	141	—
Progressists.....	—	96
Daido Club.....	36	24
Seiko Club.....	10	16
Unaffiliated.....	31	25
	218	161

There is thus a majority of 57 in favour of the bill. Our Tokyo contemporary adds that as the various parties are sparing no effort to increase their ballots, some changes in the present estimate may be expected when the bill is brought before the whole house. Discussion of the bill by the special committee began on March 8th.

According to the Asahi, the special committee, consisting of forty-five members, may be classified as:—

Supporters.....	23
Opposers.....	20

NAVAL NEWS.

The destroyer Hatsuyuki, which was launched on March 8th at Yokosuka, is 233 feet in length; 21 feet beam; 6 feet draught; displacement, 380 tons; horse-power, 6,000 tons; and speed, 29 knots; her equipment being 6 twelve-pounder quickfiring and 2 torpedo tubes.

The cruiser Takachiho, of the South China Squadron, which was undergoing repairs at Uraga, has arrived at Yokosuka. She will leave on March 11th for South China waters. The special training ship Anegawa Maru (formerly the Angara) left Yokosuka on March 7th for Kure on her way to South China. Previous to her departure, Admiral Sakamoto, Superintendent of the Naval Educational Department, gave an address to the petty officers and cadets with regard to naval training and devotion to the country's service. The Commander of the vessel is Captain Hanabusa.

CHINA.

Saturday, March 3.

Japanese papers contain many telegrams with reference to the outbreak at Nanchang. A Shanghai correspondent (Jiji) says that two Japanese, H. Okazaki and H. Yamada, have taken refuge at Kuikiang under Chinese protection. Mr. A. P. Quirnbach, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, had wired to Shanghai that Nanchang was in a state of panic; several thousand people were leaving the town, fearing bombardment by foreign warships. The British gun-boat Thistle and a French gun-boat with the French Consul left Shanghai on February 28th for Kuikiang. The Chinese magistrate, who was reported to have died, is still alive but in a serious state. The British Consul and a foreign doctor have left Shanghai for Nanchang to visit the Chinese governor. Mr. Grays (?) and Rev. Mr. Kingham have been buried at Kuikiang.

Telegrams dated February 28th from Mukden to the Asahi report that General Tachimi, Commander of the Eighth Division, arrived at Mukden on Feb. 28th from the advanced line, via Tieling. He has not yet entirely recovered from the illness by which he had been prostrated.

Lieut.-General Matsunaga is undergoing treatment at a field-hospital and is still in a serious condition.

Mr. Inouye, Manager of the Mukden branch of the Yokohama Specie Bank, gave a dinner the other day to high Chinese officials and prominent merchants. Governor-General Chang, in the course of a speech, said that the business of banking would prove a useful medium to bring closer the friendly relations of businessmen in both countries. He welcomed the establishment of the bank's branch office.

The price of Japanese war-notes has gone up, the rate being now yen 1,006. Japanese drafts payable at sight are in circulation, and are accepted by the natives with perfect confidence.

Monday, March 5.

The officials of the Peking Intelligence Bureau intend to give theatrical performances with a view to raising funds for supporting a female school in the capital.

Several Russians are endeavouring to obtain concessions for crystal and silver mines in the neighbourhood of Changkiakow. They declare that the enterprise is to be undertaken jointly with China capitalists.

A Peking telegram to the Asahi reports that M. G. Dubail, French Minister, has demanded of the Chinese Government the dismissal of the Governor of Kiangsi, and compensation for the losses during the recent Nanchang troubles, reminding the Chinese officials that when he gave warning on the 23rd ult. to the Peking Foreign Office about the threatening situation at Nanchang he was promised that China would afford full protection to the lives and property of foreign residents.

The Jiji's correspondent at Shanghai wires that Magistrate Kiang, of Nanchang, died on the morning of the 1st inst.

A Peking message states that Tang Shao-i, Chinese Plenipotentiary in the Russo-Chinese negotiations has, with the approval of Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai, decided to have Taotai Cheu Pan present at the conference. It may be remembered that Cheu was the man who made secret contracts with Russians for the lease of some mines in the Amur province then under his superintendence, and was recently arrested by order of Viceroy Yuan. This decision on the part of the Chinese Plenipotentiary is considered at Peking as a prelude to some concessions to Russia.

It is reported at Peking that Russia is determined to build a railway between Tsitsihar and Aigun, whether China will consent or not, and is now making preparations for such an enterprise.

The Governor of Kiangsi has asked the commander of a French warship which arrived in Kuikiang from Shanghai after the recent trouble, not to go so far as Nanchang and not to fire by way of demonstration. The firing, added the Governor, will further disturb the feelings of the natives.

The British Consul at Kuikiang left on March 1st Nanchang by a gun-boat in order to investigate the trouble. It is reported by the Asahi that Sir E. Satow, British Minister in Peking, paid a visit on March 2nd to the Chinese Foreign Office in connexion with the Nanchang trouble.

The Jiji's Peking correspondent says that the Russo-Chinese negotiations have not yet reached any definite conclusion. Viceroy Tung Chao-yi, one of the Chinese envoys, did not take a strong attitude at the Conference after returning from a visit to Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai at Tientsin, and he is about to give his consent to a portion of the Russian demand. He has summoned Mr. Shuben, Director of the Railway Industry Office at Tientsin, who was reported in official circles to be a spy employed by Russia, and appointed him to be present at the Conference.

A later telegram from Peking reports that the attitude of the British and French Minister was very firm as to the disturbance at Nanchang. They paid a visit to the Waiwupu and carried with them a map of the district. Pointing out the position of the foreign church, which was destroyed by the rioters, and the native military barracks, they said that the distance was very short and they further insisted that the local authorities in the district concerned must have connived at the outbreak of the trouble.

The Hochi has a telegram from Peking to the effect that some days ago a number of bombs were found at the railway station in Peking. There is also a rumour that some revolutionaries have arrived in the capital, consequently the public is uneasy. The guards of the Imperial Palace and the Capital have been increased. The rumour with regard to the illness of the Empress-Dowager is baseless.

Tuesday, March 6.

The Asahi has a telegram from Shanghai to the effect that Mr. Rockhill, American Minister in Peking, has, under the instructions of his Government, requested the Waiwupu to issue at once an Imperial edict restraining the anti-foreign demonstrations throughout the country.

It is reported that the Vice-Director of the Board of Ceremonies will be appointed ambassador to Tokyo.

A Peking telegram to the Kokumin says that the Viceroys of Mukden, Kirin and the Amur, have asked the Government for a charter to establish a steamship company promoted by Manchurian capitalists. Some Chinese capitalists of Peking have asked the Government for permission to provide water-works in the capital at a cost of half a million taels. The Government dismissed the application on the ground that the plan of the enterprise is defective. The Empress-Dowager has ordered the Minister for Military Affairs to take strict measures for protecting foreign missionaries.

A semi-official telegram says that the local Taotai has decided to pay one hundred and twenty-three thousand taels to the families of two foreign missionaries who were killed recently at Nanchang in Kiangsi province. The indemnity is reported to include damage caused to the buildings and furniture. The claims by foreign governments were thus settled.

Wednesday, March 7.

The British Consul at Kuikiang and a British doctor on March 3rd carried out a post mortem examination on the late Magistrate of Nanchang and, the following day, they paid a visit to the foreign churches which were damaged during the disturbance.

Some foreign missionaries who took refuge in the interior of Kiangsi returned on March 4th to Nanchang.

A report from Shanghai to the Jiji is to the effect that one of the wives, the second, of the late magistrate has committed suicide. Details are not yet known. Some of the people of Nanchang propose to build a Buddhist temple in honour of the deceased and her husband.

The French Minister, says the Jiji's Peking correspondent, has informed the Waiwupu that he received a telegram from a French missionary at Lu-chou in Anhui province to the effect that the feeling among the natives is uneasy since the disturbance in Kiangsi. The Minister has asked the Chinese authorities to take necessary measures for protecting foreign residents there.

The Jiji's Peking correspondent now says that the news of the resignation of Li Lien-yong, the favourite eunuch of Her Majesty the Empress Dowager, is correct. The correspondent adds that Li has been often accused by the Cabinet of having taken bribes and of various other illegal acts.

According to a Shanghai telegram, apprehension is felt at Su-chien, Kiangsu province, as to anti-foreign troubles. Viceroy Chou-Fu of Liang Kiang, and the British Consul-General in Shanghai have therefore asked the authorities of the district to take necessary measures to protect foreigners.

The Asahi publishes a Peking telegram dated March 5th, which states that uneasy rumours are in circulation in Peking. The guards have been increased throughout the Imperial Palace and the capital and strict watch is being maintained against any emergencies. Yet the correspondent notes that the German representative adheres to his proposal to withdraw the foreign troops from North China, and insists that there are no signs of an anti-foreign outbreak. The Asahi's correspondent adds that Germany is trying to obtain Chinese goodwill.

M. Pokotiloff, Russian Minister in Peking, has advised the Chinese Government to submit the Nanchang affair to the Hague Court and to employ Professor Maartens as an adviser. The British Minister has asked the Chinese Government for the punishment of the rioters in the Nanchang affair and for the payment of indemnity to the families of those who were killed. The British representative has further asked for Chinese consent to the stationing of warships at Nanchang.

Thursday, March 8.

The Jiji has a telegram from Peking under date March 6th to the effect that an Imperial decree has been proclaimed, which says that while agitation against foreign residents was recently initiated it was most probably the work of treacherous persons who intended to disturb the peace with a view to some selfish motive. The decree gives warning to viceroys and governors to give close attention to the protection of the lives and property of foreigners, and orders them to make the utmost efforts towards eradicating the root of the anti-foreign feeling. The message further orders students of various educational institutions not to meddle with international affairs.

A Peking telegram to the Nicht Nicht says that Mr. Rockhill, American Minister, presented advice to the Waiwupu under the instructions of his Government on March 4th. He said that the anti-foreign feeling throughout the Empire was becoming grave and that the Government must take measures to deal with the expected appearance of any disturbance. The correspondent adds that the American note is similar to that presented by Mr. Uchida, Japanese Minister, some days ago.

In diplomatic circles, it is reported by the Asahi's Peking correspondent, an opinion is in circulation that the trouble in the Empire is not attributable exclusively to the anti-foreign feeling. The recent affair at Nanchang, if the reports hitherto published are correct, was caused by the indiscreet conduct of a foreign missionary. The correspondent further says that availing themselves of the foregoing the Chinese authorities intend to take a strong stand against the pretensions of Catholic priests.

It is an open secret, says the L. & C. Express, that Sir Ernest Satow is retiring from the post of British Minister to China in the coming spring, after his long term of distinguished service in the Far East. Considerable interest is felt in the successor who will follow him. Of those who are known in the Far East two names are mentioned more than others. These are Sir Pelham Warren, H.B.M.'s Consul-General at Shanghai, and Sir John Jordan, who is only just home from Korea. Sir Pelham has many advocates, but it is thought that the precedent of moving the Senior Consul-General in the China Service to be Minister at Peking has been so avoided hitherto that it may not be made now. Sir John Jordan is believed to stand a better chance, but an outside appointment altogether may be made.

Friday, March 9.

The Italian Minister has asked the Peking Government to revise the commercial convention between Italy and China. The Waiwupu replied that such negotiations could not be undertaken until after the conference with Germany for a similar purpose has concluded.

The Chinese Government intends to use the Kupch silver tael for foreign trade, for which purpose the Waiwupu has asked the foreign representatives for their consent. This silver was formerly refused owing to its inferior quality and consequently the Financial Department prohibited its circulation.

The construction of an office for the magistrate of Hsingning, Kuantung, has commenced. The district will be opened to foreign trade after the construction of a railway between Hsingning and Huangchou.

The Empress Dowager is said to be showing a keen interest in the establishment of girls' schools throughout the country; and, moreover, insists that the first step to be taken is to have the girls unbind their feet. A report and a return of the schools already established is to be submitted to Her Majesty.

The writer of Native Notes in the North China Daily News has the following remarks to make concerning the political outlook in China:—

The news transmitted by Reuter that the American Government fear internal troubles in China this year and are therefore preparing for such an emergency is ridiculed in all well-informed Chinese circles whether official or mercantile. So far as can be seen the only internal troubles that need be feared in this country will be of a local nature, such as anti-Christian outbreaks, which cannot spread beyond the hsien, or district originating such outbreaks. Any national disorders are considered improbable. True, the extreme end of the so-called Reform Party, headed by such theorists as Kang Yu wei, Liang Chichao, Dr. Sun Yet-sen, and the like, have been trying to foment an anti-dynastic revolution in China by means of the aid which they hope to procure from the Chinese in the United States, Australia, and islands of the Pacific and Indian Ocean, who are being inflamed against the present dynasty by these so-called Reformers, and their emissaries. Indeed, certain adventurous foreigners have even been engaged to act as officers and instructors of the proposed Revolutionary Army; but it will be found that, when put to the test, these anti-dynastic intrigants will show themselves too fond of their own precious bodies to put themselves into the least danger, for as good disciples of Confucius "to be filial sons" they dare not do anything to disfigure the symmetry of their persons, which have been given them by their parents, and shorten their usual height by a head, or give pain to their valuable carcasses, "because these carcasses were transmitted them by their fathers and mothers, and to pain them would be to pain their parents." Such being the case, it will only be those who are foolhardy enough to be the ignorant instruments of the so-called Reformers who will suffer, if ever any attempts be made to put matters to the test on Chinese soil. They will find that the country is quite satisfied with its present rulers and that those who have a true desire to bring about their country's progress—and they really are legion—are anxious to do so gradually, by educating the masses; in fact, to create a strong and wealthy and progressive Empire not by revolution but by evolution. Outsiders will soon enough see—we are writing from a full knowledge of facts—if any attempts are made to disturb the status quo that those desiring a change of dynasty are only a mere drop in the ocean of humanity which peoples this Empire of the dragon flag.

A memorial from Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai, which has been approved, recommends the establishment at Tientsin of a Bureau to control mining operations made in Chihli; any applications made in behalf of foreigners to be severely dealt with. Liang Tun-jen, Customs Taotai at Tientsin, has been appointed Director of the new Bureau.

The Peking and Tientsin Times of the 12th February draws attention to the "irreparable loss" suffered by the Chinese by the resignation of Dr. Tenney, "the distinguished educationalist, who has done so much for the advancement of the highest educational interests in China." His resignation is a sign of the times; it has been brought about by the vacillation and inconstancy of the Chinese, who do not deserve the devotion that Dr. Tenney has shown in educational work, do not know enough to appreciate it, and believe that any chance Japanese, or German, or Englishmen, or even Russian, who can get the ear of an official, can carry on the work that Dr. Tenney has done. He is quite ready to continue if he receives fair treatment, for it must not be supposed that his resignation is in any sense voluntary.

Mr. V. H. Deacon, senior partner in the legal firm, Deacon Looker, and Deacon, left Hongkong finally for home on the 10th, after 26 years work in the Colony.

It is reported from Peking that notwithstanding the repeated petitions on the part of the Anhui provincial gentry to the Waiwupu and Shangpu demanding the cancellation of Sir J. Lister Kaye's Tungshan concession, on the ground of lapse of time, the Central Government in Peking has consented to grant a delay of two months in order to give the concessionaire time to start work on the mine.

The Shanghai to Shoochow section of the Huning railway being ready to be opened to public traffic during the next fifth moon, when railway transportation of goods will be availed of by the public, the Acting Provincial Judge at Shoochow, Chu Chih-tsen, who is, also Director of the Likin Bureau, is, says the Nangfanpao, taking steps to have likin stations along the railway. It has been decided to establish stations only at the Shanghai and Shoochow railway termini, and likin paid at either station will frank the goods through to the other station without any other payment whatever.

THE MORALITY OF THE FUTURE.

Maurice Maeterlinck, the Belgian mystic, in an article in the Fortnightly Review, discusses the question whether ethics would survive if Christianity should disappear. Many practices which are now maintained he believes will be thrown off as hurtful. He argues that "what constitutes the essence of morality is the sincere and strong wish to form within ourselves a powerful idea of justice and love which always rises above that formed by the clearest and the most generous portions of our intelligence."

The source of morality, Maeterlinck says, must be sought not in precepts or religions but in "imagination and the mystic summit of our reason. Do and say what we may, we have never been, we are not yet, a sort of purely logical animal. There is in us, above the reasoning portion of our reason, a whole region which answers to something different, which is preparing for the surprises of the future, which is awaiting the events of the unknown. This part of our intelligence, which I will call imagination or mystic reason, in times when, so to speak, we knew nothing of the laws of nature, came before us, went ahead of our imperfect attainments, and made us live morally, socially, and sentimentally, on a level very much superior to that of those attainments. The fairest discoveries, in biology, in chemistry, in medicine, in physics, almost all had their starting-point in an hypothesis supplied by imagination or mystic reason, an hypothesis which the experiments of good sense have confirmed, but which latter, given to narrow methods, would never have foreseen."

The rationalist and materialist must recognize the need for sparing "all that hitherto formed the herbic, cloud-topped, indefatigable, adventurous energy of our conscience. Leave us a few fancy virtues. Allow a little space for our fraternal sentiments. It is very possible that these virtues and these sentiments, which are not strictly indispensable to the just man of to-day, are the roots of all that will blossom when man shall have accomplished the hardest stage of 'the struggle for life.' Also, we must keep a few sumptuary virtues in reserve; in order to replace those which we abandon as useless, for our conscience has need of exercise and nourishment. Already we have thrown off a number of constraints which were assuredly hurtful, but which at least kept up the activity of our inner life. . . . Our ideal no longer asks to create saints, virgins, martyrs; but, even though it take another road, the spiritual road that animated the latter must remain intact, and is still necessary to the man who wishes to go further than simple justice. It is beyond that simple justice that the morality begins of those who hope in the future. It is in this perhaps fairy-like, but not chimerical, part of our conscience that we must acclimatize ourselves and take pleasure. It is still reasonable to persuade ourselves that in so doing we are not dupes."

FIRES.

Fire broke out early on the morning of March 2nd in the dwelling of Viscount O. Ashikaga, in Tokyo, destroying the building and all the property contained in it.

About the same time, fire occurred in a warehouse belonging to the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha, Shin-tsukudajima, Tokyo, destroying five thousand bags of coke.

KOREA.

Marquis Ito, Resident-General, arrived in Seoul at 4 p.m. on March 2nd in company with Mr. Tsuruhara, Director of General Affairs, and Mr. Kikuchi, Director of the Department of Agriculture, Commerce and Industry, both of the Residency-General; General Baron Hasegawa, Commander of the Army in Korea, and other high Korean and Japanese officials, who met His Excellency at Fusan. On his arrival in Seoul, nineteen guns were fired, as His Excellency holds rank equivalent to Field-Marshal and Admiral of the Fleet, and a military escort was in attendance. Mr. Kim, an Imperial Korean official, and other high Korean officials and officers as well as Japanese notables welcomed him on the platform. His Excellency at once proceeded to the Palace, where the Emperor received him. He presented his credentials to His Majesty after which he proceeded to the former Japanese legation, which has been temporarily converted into the Residency-General. The streets of the Korean capital were decorated with Japanese and Korean flags combined, and many fire-works were discharged. A battalion of Korean soldiers guarded the Resident-General and the streets through which Marquis Ito passed.

It would seem, remarks the Seoul Press Weekly, that even royalty is not altogether exempt from the failing of imitation, for we read in a native contemporary that, since his return from Japan, Prince Yi Chai-whan has not been altogether satisfied with the status of royalty as such in his native country. The attentions and compliments he received while in Japan and the State dignity which are enjoyed by the princes of the Blood Royal in that country, have aroused in his mind a feeling of—shall we say—envy, and a determination to endeavour upon his return here to emulate the same. One point which struck the Korean Prince was the "dignity and influence of the Japanese Princes as the Bulwark of the Imperial House" and the distinction observed between them and the "high officials." While in Korea, alas! the princes of the Blood are actually sometimes subordinate to the official class! This being so, Prince Yi Chai-whan intends henceforth to maintain the "Dignity of the Korean Imperial House" and to accentuate his own, by following the example in his household of his more fortunate brother princes in Japan. The primary step seems to be to engage a Chamberlain and a Steward, the next to "keep a carriage," which has already arrived from Japan, and so enraptured has the Prince become of all Japanese customs and manners, that in the near future there seems every probability of his mingling his own manners and customs into those of the inhabitants of the "Land of the Rising Sun."

On March 4th, a Russian named M. Koelberg arrived in Seoul from Shanghai to take charge of Russian official property—the legation, etc.—which has been under the care of the French Consul. The Asahi's Seoul correspondent says that he was formerly employed by the Russian Government and was for a time a Secretary of the legation in the Korean capital. Being, however, practically a private individual he consequently had to await formal instructions from his Government.

Mr. Soyeda, President of the Nippon Industrial Bank, has arrived in Seoul. He intends to open a branch office there.

General Li Keung-thaik, Minister for war, who was assaulted and wounded in his official residence, is reported to have practically recovered after treatment in the Seoul Hospital (Japanese). It is added that several persons are still undergoing examination on suspicion of connexion with the attack upon the Minister. No active participator, however, has yet been found.

The Residency-General has decided not to impose duty on Japanese goods consigned to Manchuria through Korea by train.

It is reported by the Hochi that on the night of March 1st, fire broke out in the Korean mint at Lungsan destroying the main building covering about four hundred tsubo. The damage is estimated at two hundred thousand yen.

The Emperor of Korea is reported to be ill, and consequently His Majesty has not yet received Marquis Ito, Resident-General. On March 5th, Mr. Kokufu, one of the secretaries of the Residency-General, proceeded to the Imperial Palace on behalf of Marquis Ito, making enquiries as to the Emperor's condition.

Mr. Soyeda, President of the Industrial Bank, gave a dinner on March 6th to the leading Japanese and Korean traders of Seoul and Chemulpo. Mr. Soyeda afterwards held a conference with his guests regarding the best method of investing capital in commercial and industrial enterprises in Korea.

It is reported by the Kokumin's Seoul correspondent that the preliminary examination of Mr. Chin Song-Kneng, ex-member of the Cabinet, who is alleged to be connected with the attempted assassination of Mr. Kenny-thaik, Minister for War, is in progress. The proceedings are being held in camera.

SUBMARINES FOR THE RUSSIAN NAVY.

In connection with the reconstruction of the Russian Fleet, a Commission was appointed to prepare a report on submarine boats and their utility, and this report, signed by Lieutenant Risnitch, is now available. He has gone very carefully into the whole question of design and strategical value, and in his report gives his "confident assurance that for fighting qualities the Holland submarine is the best type," representing the best present-day practice of submarine torpedo craft. The Lake type of submarine he regards as essential for mercantile use, and of value for divers, but he accepts as of greater value than any of the submarine boats examined the Holland type, because its speed is greater, and its diving period shorter. In the course of tests made he found that from the giving of the order—the whole crew being then above water—until the moment when the submarine had reached a depth of 20 ft., only 11½ minutes had elapsed; but he considers that this could be reduced to 9½ minutes. He enters at length into the question of motors, accumulators, periscopes, &c.; and on the point of the vitiation of the air, he considers that the smallest craft is quite capable of maintaining an air supply for at least six hours' submergence. The question of the poisoning of the air by sulphurous gases from the accumulators, or by fumes exuding from the tanks with petrol or other combustible, is the most serious. This, however, has been completely overcome, after careful test in the British boats, by the accumulators being themselves securely covered. Lieutenant Risnitch has examined also the various proposals made in connection with the insurance of safety, but has little sympathy with the idea that detachable weights should be provided, so that their release may give buoyancy to the vessel even when it is largely water-logged. The only preventives in his opinion, are solid construction and satisfactory apparatus for emptying the tanks in the event of any contingency arising. As to the strategic value, he is sanguine, especially in the matter of rear attack on a ship. The facilities offered for combating the submarine are also reviewed, and are dismissed as unsatisfactory—notably the arrangement of a torpedo craft, as proposed by the British Admiralty. This, he thinks, might, under favourable conditions, be once in a way satisfactory, but could never be relied upon, as the chances would be in favour of the commander of the submarine boat avoiding it. Lieutenant Risnitch gives various results of speed and other tests made by American Holland boats, but as these have been excelled by the craft with the Holland as a basis for improvement, it is scarcely worth while giving them. The speeds attained in service were originally 8 and 9 knots, but since then this has been considerably improved on, and even the time for immersion given by the Russian officer has also been shortened in the British service.—Engineering.

THE TWO YEARS' CONSCRIPTION SYSTEM.

This question, which has been exercising people's minds very much of late, seems to be now decided. On the 3rd instant a Representation having been introduced by the Progressists in the Lower House advocating the adoption of the two years' system, the occasion was taken to address some questions to General Terauchi. He replied in effect that the Government had decided to introduce the proposed change, but that no special legislation would be necessary, such matters being within the domain of the Imperial Prerogatives. He explained, however, that the prevalent supposition as to a reduction of term involving also a reduction of outlay was a mistake. In point of fact the adoption of the two years' system would mean an additional expenditure of 3 million yen annually for the seventeen Divisions. This is easily understood. Take for example the Infantry unit, a company of 140 men. At present these are raised by sections spread over three years, but under the new system seventy men will have to be raised each year and in order to complete the military education of one half-company in two years an additional staff of instructors will have to be employed, and altogether the educational staff will have to be much larger. The Japanese press, however, seems to be entirely satisfied with this arrangement inasmuch as for a small outlay of three hundred thousand pounds annually the effective fighting forces of the Empire will be increased by one-third.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

The transport Mutsu Maru, with Lieut.-General Oseko, Commander of the Seventh Division, and his staff and a number of soldiers belonging to the Division, went ashore on the night of March 6th, off Shiruchi, near Hakodate. The passengers and crew landed safely at Shiruchi the following morning.

Owing to a gale, two torpedo-boats, Nos. 62 and 64, went ashore off Tsuraga, Echizen province, on the night of March 7th. They were at once saved.

THE ORIENTATION OF CHURCHES AND THE SUN MYTHS.

It is a matter of common knowledge, remarks the writer of Science Gossip in the Globe, that churches are usually built with have aid chancel running east and west. It is, perhaps, not so generally known that the orientation is not always exactly east and west. In a large number of cases the chancel points not exactly east but to that point of the horizon where the sun rises on the day of the saint to whom the church is dedicated. The most interesting of these "astronomical churches," as they may be called, is perhaps the Cathedral of Florence. For this church is fitted with an arrangement for determining the Summer Solstice. This was the work of Paolo Toscanelli, physician and cosmographer, and contemporary of Columbus. The sunlight, passing through a window in the dome of the cathedral, falls on a gnomon which is built into the marble sill of the window. Thence through a circular aperture it passes on to a solstitial marble slab in the cathedral floor 300 feet below. On this slab the correct position for the light on the Summer Solstice was marked. It is thought that this great instrument was designed by Toscanelli for the correction of the Alphonsine tables then in use. Possibly, also, it was intended for the observation of the variation in the obliquity of the ecliptic. In a series of interesting articles which have appeared in Nature, Sir Norman Lockyer has shown that Stonehenge was a much more ancient and perfect arrangement for determining the Summer Solstice. Built about 1680 B.C., the avenue of Stonehenge was a sight-line pointing to the rising sun on the day of the Summer Solstice. As the sun rose the light flashed along this avenue to the inner building, where the watcher was waiting its advent. The great temples of Karnak and Amen-Ra, as the same astronomer has shown, were erected for a similar purpose. In this case a beam from the setting sun flashed along a darkened passage 500 yards long into the Holy of Holies. Here the priest was waiting to fulfil the rites of the Manifestation of Ra. The ancient British festivals were celebrated by the lighting of fires, and there seems to have been a similar custom in Florence, of which traces still remain. The chief attraction to the modern Florentine on Midsummer Day is the great display of fire-works. This is thought to be simply the relics of the "St. John's Fires" kindled in former times to celebrate the Summer Solstice.

THE BURMESE WOMAN.

All visitors to Burmah sing the praises of its women-folk. Their charm appealed very piquantly to Sir Frederick Treves, and in a description of his rambles round the globe, which he published under the title of "The other side of the lantern," he prints some vivid pen-pictures of these fascinating specimens of femininity. The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Burmah has drawn forth a warm eulogy on the same topic from the Special Commissioner of The Times, and part of it is worth quoting:

Beautiful as is the life-story of the founder of Buddhism, admirable as is the Buddhist gospel of infinite pity and self-renunciation, a cheerless pessimism would seem to be logically the dominant note of a religion which teaches that existence is and can be naught but suffering, and that the highest form of moral endeavour is slowly to climb through successive existences the painful ladder of selflessness until the sense of individual existence is completely extinguished and lost for ever in the perfect peace of non-existence. Yet it cannot necessarily be so, for Buddhism, counts among its votaries the two peoples of the East whose whole being tingles with the joyousness of life, the Burmese and the Japanese. Cast in a softer mould, the Burmese may not possess the sterner qualities which temper the Japanese joie de vivre, but they have in an almost higher degree than the Japanese that sunshiny disposition, that naive and almost childlike power of enjoyment, which so long prevented superficial observers from taking Japan seriously. It is this which, even more than the widest distinctions of race, of language, and of creed, marks at first sight the difference between India and Burma—India, the land of hoary antiquity which even in its most gorgeous aspects is apt always to wear a look of unutterable weariness and sadness, as if weighed down under the accumulated burden of countless ages, and Burma, the land of perennial youthfulness where life seems to be a perpetual festival of sunshine and colour and smiling gladness.

What is the secret of this difference? Some maintain, and probably with truth, that it lies very largely in the position assigned to woman in the social structure of the two countries respectively. In India woman has been for ages eliminated as far as possible from every outward manifestation of social life. Behind the purdah and in the recesses of the zenana the Indian woman is condemned to live and move and have her being from her cradle to her grave. A power within the walls of her own house, and in certain stations of life and under quite exceptional conditions a power in the government of the State, she is a power ever veiled and unseen. We at home are so accustomed to the all-pervading influence of the ewig weibliche in our midst that we hardly realize its gracious significance until we come to an Eastern country where it has been banished from the open; and even in an Eastern country there are so many other things almost equally strange to us that we are apt to miss the full import of this particular phenomenon until we pass into another Eastern country, equally full of unthought sights and wonders but where we find ourselves once more restored to the benign presence of the "eternal feminine." And for feminine grace and charm, alertness of mind and sweetness of temper, the Burmese woman holds a remarkably high place. That she is an essentially womanly woman can be gathered at once from her dainty gait, her ready tongue, her rippling laugh, and the exquisite sense of colour and finished neatness shown in every detail of her dress. But she is much more than a mere butterfly to gladden the eye. She is not only a wise and thrifty housewife, but she often develops singular aptitude for business. Nowhere in India, except amongst the Parsees and the Christian communities of Cochin in Southern India, is the standard of female literacy so high as in Burma, and this is doubtless entirely due to the absence of all prejudices in favour of the seclusion of women. The Burmese woman is, in fact, everywhere en evidence; in the market place, in shops and counting-houses, in the Buddhist temple and in her own home, in every social and religious function of Burmese life, modest and self-possessed, mindful alike of the privileges and of the responsibilities of her sex.

So startling is the contrast in this respect with India that the Burmese woman is apt to make one overlook the Burmese man. Yet the absence in Burma of that rigid system of caste which exercises so benumbing an influence upon Indian society is almost as noteworthy as the absence of the restrictions which have cramped the activities of the women of India. Merry and easygoing, the Burmese man is perhaps, if anything, a spoilt child of nature, which has lavished its fruits upon him in return for a minimum of toil. As a handicraftsman he exhibits both imagination and execution, whether in the carving of wood and of ivory, or in the working of gold and silver, or in the weaving of delicate silk tissues. As a husbandman he is not unskilful, though very conservative in his ways, and content for the most part to rely on the unaided munificence of his favoured soil. But he possesses neither the methodical intelligence of the European, nor the muscular endurance of the Tamil, nor the plodding tenacity of the Chinaman. He revels in bright clothes and long-drawn holidays. He loves to smile and to be smiled upon, and to bask in the warm sunshine of life, whilst his yellow-robed priests, in return for the offerings he never grudges them, "make merit" for him in the world or worlds to come.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The Petitions Committee of the Lower House met on Feb. 28th and discussed the Government bill regarding the examination of raw silk. Mr. Wada, Vice-Minister for Agriculture and Commerce, said that the law was necessary to prevent the manufacture of silk of the worst quality, while it would facilitate foreign trade. Mr. S. Shimada, one of the petitioners asking for the rejection of the bill, said that the law was regarded as a confession that Japanese manufacturers are making an inferior staple with a view to mixing with silks of better quality; consequently the law would spoil the reputation of Japanese raw silk abroad. The law was also regarded as the imposition of an export tax as various fees will be incurred by inspection. Finally the law would impede the development of the silk industry, whereas the Government would only increase its yearly income by twenty thousand yen. The Committee decided unanimously to throw out the bill.

The collection of Japanese prints, paintings, illustrated books, etc., which Mr. Crosby S. Noyes has presented to the Library of Congress, Washington, is now open to public inspection. We learn from American newspapers that the collection consists of about one thousand illustrated books, four or five hundred prints and engravings and as many as two hundred and fifty original sketches, and it is supplemented by a loan collection of netsuke, kodguta handles, sword guards, old and modern bronzes, wood and ivory carvings, lacquers and ceramics.

Count Arco-Valley effected his purpose on Saturday morning and escaped from Tokyo virtually incognito. His Excellency succeeded in keeping almost everyone, except the members of his own Legation, ignorant of the hour of his intended departure, and thus, instead of having an altogether exceptional send-off, his farewell ceremony was on a very small scale. We have already on more than one occasion expressed our opinion of the unique services rendered to German interests in Japan by this most able and popular official. It remains therefore only to add that we have never seen such unanimous and obviously sincere expressions of regret in Japanese newspapers on the occasion of the departure of a Foreign Representative.

The amounts paid by life insurance companies throughout the empire on account of insured persons who died during the late war from wounds or sickness, says the Hochi, are a little over a million yen. The sums insured were about three hundred yen on an average. It is added that the premiums received by all companies amounted to yen 8,160,000 in 1904 and yen 9,000,000 in 1905, each in round numbers.

Mr. Kato, Minister for Foreign Affairs, was released from office on March 3rd at his own request. His portfolio was taken temporarily by Marquis Saionji, the Premier. Mr. Kato's resignation is attributed to the proposed nationalization of private railways, to which project he was known to be opposed. About the same time, the Premier presented to the Emperor the proposal which had been approved by the Cabinet. His Majesty gave his sanction at once. Probably the bill will be introduced to the Diet to-day, March 5th.

In September this year, the Fifth International Life Insurance Conference will take place in Berlin. A representative of the Japanese insurance companies and a Government delegate will be present. The deputies have not yet been selected.

Madame la Baronne d'Anethan left Tokyo by the 4.30 p.m. train on the 2nd instant for Europe where it is her intention, we believe, to remain until the fall of the year. A great crowd of all nationalities assembled at Shimbashi station to bid farewell to this highly popular and gifted lady whose return will be anxiously looked for.

Science has to mourn the loss of a distinguished worker in its realms by the death of Dr. H. Sprengel, who by his invention of the mercury air pump paved the way to Sir W. Crookes's theory of radiant matter, of which the Röntgen rays, as The Times remarks, is a lineal descendant, and enabled Sir Joseph Swan to perfect his incandescent lamp, rendering possible, as it did, the obtaining of a vacuum of very high tenuity. It is pleasant to remember that, although by birth a German, Dr. Sprengel spent the greater part of his distinguished life in England and worked as a young man in the laboratories of Guy's and St. Thomas's Hospitals; while for three years he was an assistant in the chemical laboratories of Oxford University. Besides his mercury air pump, which has done so much both for science and industry, Dr. Sprengel devoted much of his time to the study of detonation and explosives. As long ago as 1871 he took out patents for explosive substances, which, while non-explosive during manufacture and transport, effected their purposes when mixed. He was also the first to call attention to the value of picric acid, used in melinite and lyddite, as an explosive when fired by a detonator; and only recently (he was in his seventy-second year) he applied for a patent relating to the production of diamonds at high temperatures.

H. M. cruiser Donegal, which went ashore in the Gulf of Suez, is coming to China waters to relieve the cruiser Andromeda, Captain Robert N. Ommaney. Capt. W. J. Grogan, a well-known Irish officer, is in command. The Donegal is manned by 700 officers and men. Captain Grogan entered the Navy in 1871, was promoted lieutenant in 1882, commander in 1895, and captain on the last day of 1900. He is no stranger to the station, having served here previously and also on the East Indies Station.

The number of prisoners of war, according to the Asahi, is now supposed to have been as follows:—

Rank and file of the Army .....	55,966
Rank and file of the Navy .....	14,400
JAPANESE.

The residence of Prince Arisugawa has been entered by a burglar or burglars. A pair of silver flower-vases presented to the Prince by the Empress, and half a dozen silver plates were stolen from the dining-room.

During February, the prices of commodities fell slightly. The following gives a comparison of prices in January and February:—

	February.	January.
Domestic Commodities .....	120.48	120.42
Domestic products for export .....	117.78	119.56
Imported goods .....	115.75	116.88
Average .....	118.70	119.27

The fall was represented by 0.48 per cent.

The interest in Will Adams, the First Englishman to visit Japan, is perennial. Quite recently, through the efforts of H. E. Governor Sufu, Sir Claude Macdonald and Mr. James Walter, a scheme has been set on foot to restore his monument at Hemi-mura, Yokosuka, and to convert the site into a public park. Many influential Japanese noblemen have shown their sympathy with the project by subscribing liberal sums to the funds necessary for its achievement and an effort will be made to influence people in England. Meanwhile we read in Vol. VI., Part III., of the Proceedings of the Japan Society, which reached us by the Canadian Mail, that Mr. Diosy has proposed that the Society subscribe money to erect a replica of the Japanese monument at Gillingham, Adams' native place in Kent. Estimates have been prepared for making the monument in Japan from native granite and the N.Y.K. have offered to convey it to England free of charge.

Subscriptions for the Sixth Exchequer Bonds, which were issued on Saturday, are as follows:—

	Yen.
Imperial Household .....	40,000,000
Bank of Japan .....	40,000,000
The Deposit Department of the Bank of Japan .....	10,000,000
Industrial Bank .....	5,000,000
Industrial Encouragement Bank .....	1,000,000
12 other banks .....	40,270,000
	136,270,000

The amounts subscribed by forty-nine other leading banks of Tokyo, Yokohama, Osaka, etc. will be announced on March 6th.

The establishment of mills by the Armstrongs at Hiratsuka, which had been written about since the restoration of peace, says the Asahi, is now reported to be a fact. The area of the factory covers a little over two miles square on the Banyu River. The expense of initiating the plant is estimated at about fifty million yen.

The Government intends, says the Asahi, to increase its income from import duties by revising the tariff, for which purpose a bill has been submitted to the Diet. The receipts from duties before the war aggregated seventeen million yen. After the war, an extraordinary tax was added to the duties by which eight million yen was derived, making a total of twenty-five million yen. If now, as proposed, two million yen be raised by revising the tariff and added to the foregoing the total will be twenty-seven million yen. Thus ten million-yen may be regarded as increased imposts upon imported goods as compared with the duties before the war.

Sir Malcolm McEacharn, who is honorary Japanese Consul at Melbourne, and recently arrived in Tokyo, will be received in audience by the Emperor on March 12th.

IMPERIAL DIET.

The House met at 10.07 a.m. on March 3rd. Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, gave a brief speech on the Government bill regarding the abolition of taxes on Exchequer bills. It was referred to a special committee. The Government bill regarding revision of the Railway Construction Law was passed through three readings. The bill regarding jurisdiction in Korea passed its second reading. The revision of Law 13 (regarding pensions to be given to nurses employed in public kindergartens) promulgated in 1896, was handed to a special committee without discussion. Finally, the private bill regarding the remission of taxes in the famine provinces, which was sent in from the Lower House, was submitted. After a hot debate between the members belonging to the Kendyu-kwai and Doyo-kwai, the bill was passed by a majority without referring to the second and third readings.

The House adjourned at 11.09 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

This House sat at 1.09 p.m. on March 3rd. Mr. H. Soyano presented a question as to the two years' service of conscripts. General Terauchi, Minister for War, said in reply that from the point of view of military education there were several objections to changing the present three-years system to two years. But during the late war it was ascertained that soldiers of two years' training were quite competent to go into the fighting line, and the Government would propose the adoption of the two-years system.

The revisions in the Accounts Law, and the Court Organization Law and a bill regarding the re-assessment of land value along the Watarase River, were passed throughout the various readings. Private bills regarding the revision in the Procedure Law of the Diet and a proposal regarding the two years service of the conscripts were introduced and Mr. K. Fuji and Mr. S. Tsunoda gave brief explanations of each. These were submitted to special committees. The proposal for holding an international commercial and industrial exhibition was also handed to a special committee without discussion. Finally various petitions were introduced. Many of them were ordered to be discussed.

At 4.06 p.m. the House rose.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

On March 6th the House of Peers passed a budget for the next fiscal year with all the supplementary budgets and correlated documents as submitted by the Government and sent up by the Lower House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

In the House of Representatives the Bill relating to habutaye was passed in a radically altered form so that it ceases to have any special interest.

The bill for the nationalization of private railways was handed to a special committee of forty-five. The Prime Minister himself appeared in the House and offered an explanation of the Bill, but His Excellency did not give any analysis of reasons, the gist of his statement being that the Government had long contemplated this measure and had been deterred from taking it sooner by lack of suitable opportunity only.

PRESENTATION TO A GERMAN CAPTAIN.

The passengers by the German mail steamer Princess Alice, on the outward trip, were so pleased with the care and courtesy of the Commander, Capt. Polack, that, before getting in to Singapore, they drew up and presented to him an Address as follows:—

"We, the undersigned, have much pleasure in expressing our sincere satisfaction at the delightful voyage we have had under the care of yourself and your officers.

"You have assisted us in every way and your tact and kindness have helped to make our time pass most pleasantly; indeed, in the opinion of the oldest and most experienced travellers to the East, this has been the most enjoyable voyage they ever had."

The Address was presented on Friday by Mr. McAlpine in the absence of Sir Malcolm McEacharn, as spokesman of the 70 or 80 passengers who signed it, in a pleasant, informal ceremony, in the course of which healths were toasted in champagne.

On arrival in Japan it was decided to enclose the Address in a fitting case, the difficulty being that the time of the Alice's stay was very limited. However, Mr. S. Komor, one of the passengers, a partner of the firm of Kuhn & Komor, undertook the task, and in four days succeeded in executing a very handsome piece of work. The case, which is of polished stang wood, made with ornamental hinges to open like a book, has its corners bound in silver repousse work representing characteristic Japanese flowers and the well-known key and anchor of the steamship Company. In the centre of the cover is a silver plate in the form of a vase of flowers, inscribed:—

CAPT. CHAS. AUGUST POLACK
BY THE SALOON PASSENGERS OF THE G.M.S. PRINCESS ALICE.

Feb. 1906.

Within, the Address is further enclosed in a beautiful case of pink and pale blue cord, the cover being embroidered with an artistic representation of chrysanthemums.

THE TROUBLES IN CHINA.

IT remains impossible to form any definite opinion about the origin of the anti-Christian disturbance at Nanchang. The only fact which appears to have been definitely ascertained is that the local Governor met his death during an entertainment to which he had been invited by the Roman Catholic Priests for the purpose of discussing certain questions relating to transfers of property and the disposal of some charges preferred against Roman Catholic converts. It is moreover tolerably certain that he was the victim of violence, but at this point the accounts diverge, one story being that the Governor, having categorically and resolutely refused to entertain the demands of the missionaries, one of them lost control of himself and stabbed the Chinese official. Another account has it that the Governor committed suicide, or attempted to commit suicide, and was assisted to the consummation, His Excellency having lost all patience with the missionaries' demands. The two tales are almost equally incredible. It is nearly impossible to imagine that anyone of the Roman Catholic priests, whose lives in the East have always been examples of gentleness and self-negation, would commit such a murderous outrage under such circumstances. On the other hand that the Governor should seek in death a refuge from the importunities of the missionaries is only one degree less credible. We fear, nevertheless, that the incident must be included in the list of imprudent interferences with Chinese civil authority for which the Roman Catholic priests and their converts have often been censured by contemporary historians. This in fact is the main source from which trouble has always been apprehended, and it will therefore be wise not to set down the Nanchang outrages as a purely anti-foreign demonstration, until the real nature of the provocation has been ascertained. In the meanwhile, however, the trouble seems to be spreading.

THE NATIONALIZATION OF THE RAILWAYS.

THIS measure has had a stormy prelude. Already while still in embryo it has involved the resignation of Mr. T. KATO, one of the ablest members of the Ministry, whose retirement at this early stage may almost be called catastrophic. It is difficult to say whether the public will be more interested in the details of the Bill or in the reasons that forbid Mr. KATO to support it. As for the Bill, it will be presented to the Diet to-day. In a certain sense it may be described as a heroic measure. Originally the impression was that the scope of the scheme would be limited at first to the five principal private railways, and that the purchase of even these would be effected with great deliberation. But rumour, apparently trustworthy, now represents the scheme in a much more drastic light. It appears that all the private railways, great and small, are to be nationalized within the short space of five years, the purchase price being assessed at twenty times the average annual nett income of the lines during the three ante-bellum years. The amount will in each case be handed to the Directors of the Companies who will distribute it amongst the shareholders. It is against the forceful element of this scheme that Mr. KATO is said to protest. He is not an opponent of the general problem of nationalizing private railways. On the contrary he is represented as holding—though we do not in this matter speak from first hand knowledge—that state ownership of means of communication is a factor making strongly for the promotion of industry. We have already in previous articles set forth the reasons of this view and they appear to be unanswerable. But it is understood that in Mr. KATO's opinion the processes proposed by the framers of the Bill do not take sufficient account of the sanctity of private property. For the rest the Bill is said to provide that railway finances shall be included in a special account, all the nett profits being applied to the payment of interest and to the amortization of the bonds, which programme, if resolutely pursued, would mean the complete clearing off of the debt in a space of forty-five years, whereafter the Treasury would find its annual assets increased by a clear sum of fifty-five million yen. This is a very tempting bit of finance, and when considered in combination with the economical advantages of the measure, it goes far to recommend the Bill. There is, however, another point of view. The Treasury is now engaged floating a domestic loan of 200 million yen to clear up the war accounts. We cannot say exactly what figure would be involved in the railway purchase scheme, but we shall certainly be under the mark if we estimate the amount at 400 million yen. Here then we are confronted by the fact that 600 million yen worth of loan bonds would be placed upon the domestic market within the short space of five years, and it can hardly be doubted that the price of such securities would depreciate considerably. This consideration is said to have arrayed several leading financiers and bankers against the scheme, and thus it will be seen that the fate of the Bill in its passage through the Diet is decidedly problematical.

NAVAL EXPENDITURES.

THE announcement that the British naval estimates for the ensuing year show a slight reduction of a million and a half sterling over the year just closed seems to indicate that for the present the naval expenditure of the premier Sea Power has receded from the high-water mark set just before the outbreak of the Russo-Japan war. A Return prepared for presentation to Parliament just prior to the late dissolution, shows that the aggregate naval expenditure on the seagoing force of Great Britain during the year ended March 31, 1905, was £41,696,313, of which sum £38,293,738 was ordinary expenditure, and £3,402,575 was expenditure under the Naval Works Act, 1903, outside the Navy votes. For the same period during 1905 the aggregate tonnage of the mercantile marine, including that of the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, was 10,554,520, while the aggregate revenue for the year ending March 31, 1905, was £143,370,404. The naval expenditure of British India in 1904 was £541,590, including £100,000 contribution towards H.M. ships on the East Indian station; of the Australian Commonwealth, £142,951; of New Zealand, £40,742; of Natal, £35,000; of the Cape of Good Hope, £50,000; and of Newfoundland £4,308, including a contribution in respect of the maintenance of a branch of the Royal Naval Reserve. The Dominion of Canada had no naval expenditure. The aggregate revenue and aggregate mercantile tonnage for each of the Colonies is given as:—The Australian Commonwealth, £33,586,082 and 403,580 tons; New Zealand, £7,113,031 and 109,859 tons; Natal, £4,160,145 and 2,160 tons; Cape of Good Hope, £9,913,855 and 4,813 tons; Canada, £14,526,373 and 682,838 tons; and Newfoundland, £516,691 and 125,506 tons.

France, with an aggregate revenue in 1904 of £144,425,000 and an aggregate mercantile tonnage in 1903 of 1,235,341 tons, spent in 1904, £12,513,143 on her seagoing forces. Germany's aggregate revenue for the year ending March 31, 1905, was £81,137,000; her mercantile tonnage (using the figures of 1903) was 2,322,054 tons; and she spent in the year ending March 31, 1905, on her seagoing forces and for the maintenance of the forts at the naval bases, £10,567,342. In the United States during the year ending June 30, 1904, the aggregate revenue was £142,545,000; the registered tonnage for overseas trade was 898,768 tons, and the aggregate naval expenditure was £20,180,310. The corresponding naval expenditure for these three Powers for the year before was:—France, £12,538,861; Germany, £10,252,012; and the United States, £16,824,058.

The aggregate expenditure of Russia on her naval forces during 1904 was £11,827,431; and that of Japan during the year ending March 31, 1905, is given at £2,209,586, but we are reminded that as the actual expenditure for any year is seldom known for some time after the close of the period under review, the compilers of the return have merely quoted the sums voted in the various countries dealt with.

With regard to the progress of ship-building programmes during 1905, it appears that the biggest strides were made by the United States. That country completed three battleships, launched five, and began three more during the twelve months, besides launching one armoured cruiser and one protected cruiser, and laying down two armoured cruisers. The total displacement of the vessels completed is 46,000 tons and the displacement of vessels launched aggregates 103,150 tons. The total of all classes launched for the British Navy during the same period was 16, with an aggregate displacement of 97,250 tons, so that the United States is in this respect ahead of the United Kingdom in the output of the public and private yards during 1905. The vessels remaining on the stocks include the battleship New Hampshire, and the armoured cruisers Montana and North Carolina, while the new shipbuilding programme allows for two battleships, three scouts, and four submarines, all of which are now in hand. Under the heading "Fleet increase, promised and prospective," the New York Herald recently said:—"Within nine months the active fleet will, it is expected from the naval progress reports, be strengthened by the addition of seven battleships and of four armoured and three protected cruisers. Two training ships, two torpedo craft, and four submarines will within a year be also turned over for service, thus leaving under construction by January, 1907, six battleships, two armoured cruisers, and three scout cruisers, together with the two battleships authorized at the last session, and for which the modified plans are still under consideration. Though this increase in fighting types is encouraging, it is by no means a happy finality. Fairly measured, the available total a reasonable part of the logical force we should be able to muster by 1912. When this accepted maximum of 44 battleships and 22 armoured cruisers is attained the extension of the fleet can proceed easily on lines that will demand the authorization only of such vessels as may be needed to form homogeneous groups, replacing those which from obsolescence and other causes must be relegated to the reserve."

THE GERMAN AND FRENCH ARMIES.

[T] is just a year since the Reichstag voted of two laws of the greatest importance in connexion with the German army. The first of these lays down that from April 1, 1905, the peace effective of the German army will increase progressively so as to amount to 504,665 rank and file in the course of the financial year 1909, and to 505,839 men during the following financial year. The other law modified military obligations as defined by the Constitution of April 16, 1871. It is now ordained that every German fit to bear arms belongs for seven years to the regular army, then for five years to the first levy of the Landwehr, and then, up to the year in which he completes his 39th year, to the second levy of the Landwehr. In the regular army, men in the cavalry and horse artillery have to spend their first three years without interruption with the colours; in all other branches men must remain for their first two years without interruption with the colours. New regulations for the recruiting of officers have also been issued, which limit, exclusive of pupils from the cadet corps, the recruiting of officers to those men who are born in one of the confederated States or in Alsace-Lorraine; formerly every soldier who reached the necessary educational and military standards could be proposed as a candidate officer (Fähnjenker). The war department has adopted new rifle ammunition which is said greatly to augment the efficiency of the weapon. The new "S" bullet is said to have the same effect at 1,000 metres as the old bullet had at 600, and the accuracy of the firing is also increased.

We learn from The Times that several changes of importance were made in the French army during last year, which witnessed the definite adoption of the two years' period of service. The application of this law on recruiting has had a marked effect on the budget for 1906, which provides for an increase of 20 officers and 21,377 men in the active army, including the Sahara troops. The 1906 budget shows an increase of over 32 million francs compared with that of last year, which, again, was larger than that for 1904. The new law requires that the cadres should include a certain number of re-engaged men, and steps have accordingly been taken to improve the material position of these men, who form an important part of the army. In 1904, for instance, there were 41,299 non-commissioned officers in the French army, of whom 25,332 were re-engaged men, and this proportion will certainly be increased by the new regulations. The number of reserve officers continues to be insufficient, and in 1905 there was a shortage of 8,611, of whom about three-quarters were in the infantry. As regards changes in arms and accoutrements, the new "D" bullet, which is to be issued to the whole of the French infantry, has already been supplied to the 20th Army Corps. This bullet consists of a nickel case filled with a bronze cylinder. The Lebel infantry rifles are being refitted for this new ammunition and provided with sights up to 2,400 metres. Experiments have been made to reduce the weight of the infantry knapsack, which, although it weighed only 18½ lb., could not be conveniently carried. It is proposed that the soldier should carry in his pack only indispensable articles amounting to about 7½ lb. in weight, and that the rest should be carried on a company wagon. It seems probable that this system will be adopted. Tests have also been made with a four-wheeled motor-car carrying four soldiers and running on railway lines, which will, it is thought, be of service for scouting and for carrying orders during mobilization.

A QUEEN OF LOVE AND MANY SORROWS.

EVERY boy and girl of English parentage must at one time or another have taken sides with either the Cavaliers or the Roundheads, with CHARLES or with CROM-

WELL, and for many the partisanship has continued all through life. Some of us, however, have changed flags as the years rolled on and widening knowledge has disclosed very different aspects of the grim struggle than those which school histories unfolded: but the essential fact remains, we are all consciously or unconsciously Puritan or Cavalier and are ever ready to fight the battles o'er again. To most people CHARLES and CROMWELL dominate the scene so completely that many a personage who played no inconsiderable part in the tragedy has failed of receiving proper recognition. Such a character was that of HENRIETTE MARIE DE BOURBON, wife of the King whose memory Royalists in after years were to fondly cherish as Saint and Martyr. Only within quite recent years has it been possible to obtain any clear idea of that Queen of England who called herself "La Reine Malheureuse," and to discover what kind of a woman she really was. Born at the Louvre on November 25th, 1609, the youngest of the six children of HENRI QUATRE and MARIE DE MEDICIS, she was but six months old when the sword of RAVAILLAC deprived her of her father. Tragedy thus enveloped her from birth. When still but a child of fifteen she was married by deputy to CHARLES, and arrived in England in 1625, where she was met by her husband at Canterbury. The QUEEN greeted her spouse with a jest about her stature. "Sire," she said, "I stand upon my own feet. I have no help from art. Thus high am I, neither higher nor lower." The remark was typical of the "unthinking, idle, wild, little brown-eyed witch with the low sweet voice," who was to so sorely hurt herself and every one she loved before her story closed. She and her husband were both nervous, highly courageous people, hot-tempered, singularly lacking in judgment, singularly prone to think it was religion that made them so very cross to each other. If the QUEEN said it was raining and the KING said it was not, there was a scene directly; they smashed the windows when they were annoyed; the QUEEN insulted the King's favourites and the KING dismissed hers. And at last, when heads were shaken seriously, and the QUEEN had been warned that Queens of England had lost theirs before now, recognizing their utter failure to live at peace, like any common husband and wife, they suddenly became lovers and lived happily ever after—until the outbreak of the war, and except for the inevitable collision of Priests and Bishops over the cradle whenever a baby was born. HENRIETTA was herself the child of parents who had no love for each other; there had been little joy at her birth, and a certain coldness of heart, which was, perhaps, inherited, chills the sympathy evoked by many of the incidents of her life. Her religion, her affections, her courage and endurance were real enough; but the dark side of her religion was a bigotry that made her fierce and cruel to her youngest son—the shadow of her love was pride. The deeds of daring of her youth have the attraction of perfect guilelessness. Madame de CHEVREUSE, who had come with her from France, shocked the public by taking her to bathe in the river and by swimming across herself. She refused to be crowned—even to occupy a latticed seat in the Abbey whilst her husband was being crowned—because it was wrong to enter a Protestant church; and the people never forgave her this. She had little regard for truth in word; her father, the great HENRI IV., had none; and she could not have learnt it, either from MARIE DE MEDICI or from CHARLES; but there was never any occasion on which she was not true to her faith, for she was a Romanist to the core. But it is as the Queen of Love that we would best delight to treat of HENRIETTE MARIE. The breath of scandal has not touched the private life of CHARLES I and his little QUEEN. As her love for her husband grew so her character grew; and if we merely regard her in her private capacity, it is no exaggeration to say that she was perhaps as perfect a wife as the world has seen. There were no illusions in her love. She knew CHARLES as no one else, except his own Parliament, knew him. She saw the exact failings that the Parliament men saw—the weakness, the accessions of anger, the pride, the stubbornness, the subtle mind that dared do in public affairs things which would have seemed shocking in private affairs—and her aim in life was to guard him from himself. She did not spare him. Her remarks were sometimes almost brutal. But her whole life was absorbed in the KING's welfare. It may have been this quality of resolution that cast a spell over the ever-uncertain CHARLES. "Infirm of purpose" is often the text of her letters to him; but to him she manifested also the rare tenderness that she kept, as a rule, only for children, and for children only whilst they were little. Twice in his great necessity, before the worst days of all came, she stood by him. The first time was after the murder of BUCKINGHAM.

The King was at prayers with his household when the news was whispered into his ear. As he knelt on his head bent, his face covered, he gave no sign of grief or disturbance, maintaining his attitude, silent and motionless, till the devotions were concluded. With the same unmoved calm he rose and went to his private chamber. But having reached it, he flung himself on the bed in a passion of tears. The sorrow that he was bearing thus "manly and princely" appealed to her; and, generously laying aside her own personal dislike of BUCKINGHAM, she gave him the comfort and understanding which, as GORING wrote, "certainly easeth that swelling, brave heart of his in these his days of highest trials." Her second opportunity came at the judgment and death of STRAFFORD, and again she rose to it. Wayward and hostile in the days of his prosperity, she was quick to recognize her error when the great Viceroy fell. Night after night, taking a light in her hand, she went by a private stair-case to meet the most malignant of his foes in a room belonging to one of her ladies, and sought, by every promise she could make, to lessen their fury. Day after day she sat by the side of the KING to watch the trial, and they left the tribune together, "le cœur saisi de douleur, et les yeux pleins de larmes." It is not written that she urged him to make the final stand which, all his life after, he was to regret that he had not made; but she wept with him for the death of STRAFFORD, and in that agony of remorse and solitude, in the midst of a country wild with barbarous, panic-struck rejoicing, there was one heart on which he rested. The memory of the support that she could give seems to have been always with him.

"If thou knew what a life I lead" (he wrote to her before the battle of Naseby), "even in point of conversation, which in my mind is the chief joy or vexation of one's life, I dare say thou would pity me; for some are too wise, others too foolish, some too busy, others too reserved, many fantastic. I confess, thy company hath perhaps made me in this hard to be pleased. . . . Believe me, Sweetheart, thy kindness is as necessary to comfort my heart as thy assistance is for my affairs."

Again we find him confiding in her,

For, indeed, I think it not the least of my misfortunes (he writes, after hearing of her perilous voyage to Holland) that for my sake thou that run so much hazard, is which thou hast expressed so much love to me that I confess it is impossible to repay by anything I can do, much less by words; but my heart being full of affection for thee, admiration of thee, and impatient passion of gratitude to thee, I could not but say something, leaving the rest to be read by thee out of thine own noble heart.

HENRIETTE is no less expressive. In a letter from Paris, written soon after her final parting from the KING, she says:

"I trust that in spring I shall recover my health entirely provided that I have the hope of seeing you soon again; for without that there is neither medicine nor air that can cure me."

Her flight to France after Marston Moor was the one mistake which she always regretted. Her nerves appear to have given way after the excitement of her first return from France, the strain of the Court at Oxford, the birth of her youngest child, HENRIETTA ANNE. She had told the KING's doctor, Sir THEODORE MAYERNE, that she felt her reason failing, that she was afraid she should go mad. "There is no occasion to fear it, Madame," he replied, "you are mad already." When the news of the KING's death was broken to her by JERMYN, ten days after the event, she was thunder-struck. A false report had reached her of sudden intervention on the part of the people to save him as he was being led forth from prison, and on this she had built all her hopes. "She sat a long time like a statue, deaf, insensible; no one could rouse her, until, when night was falling, she heard her sister-in-law, the DUCHESSE DE VENDÔME, weep, and awoke from her stupor."

Twenty years of life still remained to her, years of mingled joy and sorrow. She saw her favourite son restored to the throne of his fathers and after the Restoration she was a kind mother to him and a good friend to his poor, neglected wife. The dullness and slowness of the DUKE of YORK moved her to satire, and she was naturally furious at his marriage with ANNE HYDE. She disowned the DUKE of GLOUCESTER after the failure of her vigorous attempts to make a Roman Catholic of him, and she refused to give him her blessing. She was, for the most part, on good terms with her eldest daughter, MARY of ORANGE; but the darling of her heart was the youngest, the second HENRIETTA, the "enfant de la benediction," who, professed the same faith as herself. Wisely she had done and dared much for the belief that had carried her through days of sunshine and of storm; and she had her reward in the gentleness and peace and quiet fading away in which her strange life ended. The great BOSSUET in his funeral oration uttered something more than a beautiful consolatory phrase when he declared that "her griefs had made her learned in the science of salvation and the efficacy of the Cross."

PRINCESS ENA.

PRINCESS VICTORIA EUGÉNIE JULIA ENA of Battenberg, who on Wednesday at St. Sebastian was formally received into the Church of Rome, preliminary to the official announcement of her engagement to the KING of SPAIN, is one of the most popular members of the Royal Family of Great Britain. As one writer in a London paper points out, "she has a wonderfully sunny temperament, and her natural brightness and cheerfulness, which reflect the kindest disposition, are quite infectious." By those who have had the privilege of meeting Princess ENA, as she is familiarly called, it is admitted that the description quoted depicts accurately enough one engaging side of her character. And it will probably strike most people as singularly appropriate, and of the best augury, that one who possesses a "wonderfully sunny temperament" should be destined to reign over a country which owes so much of its beauty and charm to its proverbial radiance. The etiquette of the Spanish Court is a somewhat formidable thing, and it has been hinted that a few of its strictest observances may possibly, in course of time, be relaxed under the influence of a young QUEEN in whom anything approaching formal stiffness is conspicuously absent. But whatever the future may bring forth in this direction it is probably true enough, as has been suggested before, that King ALFONSO, strictly brought up amid the restraint and solemnity so characteristic of all that surrounds the Spanish Throne, felt all the more drawn towards the young English Princess by reason of her unaffected simplicity, her girlish spirits, and her light-hearted disposition. This joyousness of temperament is reflected in an early-developed sense of humour, of which one little incident may be recalled as an apt illustration. It occurred at Princess ENA's "coming-out" ball, which took place, it will be remembered, at Kensington Palace in May last. One of the guests, a very shy young man, having been presented to the Princess, asked her, in a highly formal manner, whether she would honour him with a dance. With laughter in her eyes,

Princess ENA replied, "Oh, certainly, if you are quite sure you don't mind."

"It is the first instance of a member of the Royal Family being born in Scotland since the year 1600." So ran the latter part of the official announcement which conveyed the tidings of the birth of Princess ENA at Balmoral in October—the "lucky" month—1887. The circumstance of the Royal birth occurring in Queen VICTORIA'S Jubilee year may well have been regarded as of specially happy omen. Scotland was quick to celebrate the event—having, as has been noted, a very special reason for doing so—and the night of October 24 saw a bonfire lighted at Craig Gowan "in honour of the birth of the infant Princess." On November 23 the christening took place at Balmoral, the service being according to the form of baptism of the Scottish Presbyterian Church, Dr. CAMERON LEES, of St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh, officiating at the simple rites. "Victoria Eugénie Julia Ena" were the names bestowed upon the Royal infant, who derived the second of them from the Empress EUGÉNIE, who, as one of the sponsors, was represented at the christening by Princess FREDERICA of HANOVER. The Empress EUGÉNIE, as is well known, has from the first shown a very real interest in and affection for her god-child, in whose youthful spirits and unflinching vivacity, it may be readily imagined, she has found forgetfulness at times of her own sorrows. Among her possessions there are probably few cherished more highly by Princess ENA than the gifts—many in number, and some of rare value—which she has received from this devoted god-mother, a considerable part of whose fortune, it has been surmised, will in all likelihood fall to her eventually.

More than any of Queen VICTORIA'S grand-daughters, Princess ENA, in the most impressionable period of her life, came under the personal influence of Her late Majesty. Princess BEATRICE had been for so many years the late QUEEN'S constant companion that her Royal mother could not part with her even on her marriage, and thus it was that at Windsor and Osborne Prince and Princess HENRY remained with HER MAJESTY. At Osborne they had a suite of apartments with nursery accommodation that is now occupied by the nursing staff of King EDWARD'S Convalescent Home for Officers.

In this way the small Princess, who was a singularly bright and charming little personality, was constantly with the QUEEN, thus unconsciously, perhaps, acquiring the ambitions with which in more serious moments she had been credited of bearing her own part in the world's affairs. These earliest days were very quietly spent and a well-informed writer said of the Princess and her three brothers:—

The four children lead very simple lives, and, as was the rule when the Queen's own children were young, they are kept studiously apart from the official routine of Court life, and they are only seen by intimate friends of the Royal Family.

It is significant of the way in which their education is conducted that none of their attendants or visitors are allowed to speak to them in any language but English.

Princess ENA'S education was conducted under the direct supervision of her mother, whose musical tastes she inherits in no little degree. She has been constantly seen at the opera, where her sincere enjoyment of the music has always been obvious. The talent of her family for languages is possessed by her, as is also a love of art. She is fond of outdoor life, and is a good horse-woman, in spite of a nasty little accident in her earlier youth, which might well have shaken her nerves for riding. Gardening, too, has been a favourite pastime with her, as it was with her mother.

Despite some protests on behalf of the more rigid Protestants in England, the engagement has won general acceptance both in the land of the Princess' birth and in the country of the courtly hidalgo. The Spanish papers welcome the coming of an English princess and they seem particularly pleased with the manner in which the royal courtship has been conducted at Biarritz. One journal, in the course of a leading article said:—

It may be said that the love-making of the young King and the enchanting Princess constitutes a veritable idyll. Like a true Spanish cavalier, his devotion has become almost a religion, and he never pronounces her name except with a respect which amounts almost to veneration, thus allowing it to be understood that she is the queen of his heart and the mistress of all his thoughts. As the cult of beauty and gallantry is innate in all Spaniards, the people applaud with all their hearts the choice of their young monarch, and are ready to extend to their future Queen the most enthusiastic and friendly reception.

THE FAMINE.

First is a word of hope. One of the most trying experiences of this winter has been the difficulty of rapidly getting aid on a large scale to the tens of thousands of sufferers. It is now an immense satisfaction to know that aid from many sources is going direct to the famishing people in the shape of free food. I have just returned from the northern part of Miyagi-ken, and found that eight cars full of army hard tack had just been unloaded at Kogota, 340 bags of rice at Semene, and over 500 at Ishikoshi, all for free distribution, and all bought with contributions from Japanese, which now amount to about 400,000 yen.

Talking with two county chiefs, I learned that the Imperial gift of 25,000 yen for Miyagi Province had all been distributed, 3,000 yen of this money went to Kuribara County which is the worst of the seventeen in this province. Here it was given out in sums of two yen to each house where there were no able bodied adults, and one yen and a half to destitute homes some of whose members could do a little work. But to make these sums last as long as possible the money was deposited in the various post offices and the recipients were given passbooks with which they could draw ten sen a day. Thus the greatest care is taken to prevent any misuse of funds.

There has come to this county office in all over 5,000 yen, and there are now 6,662 absolutely destitute persons in the county. Various sums of money have come to individuals, and the different villages have made local contributions.

I took to this county 960 yen, and the chief said that with what he had in hand he could carry those 6,662 people about two weeks longer. Then the public works, for which thousands have been waiting, will be fairly opened and work will be given to all.

It was indeed a joy to see food in abundance going into the heart of the famine region, and to learn that all the money our Committee has distributed, now amounting to 25,000 yen has gotten into circulation just where it is most needed, and this was the first money that was used for free distribution of food.

There are 73 schools in this county, and army hard tack is distributed every day to the children who are too poor to bring a lunch. This delicious bread is a powerful attraction towards the schools, and there is now no complaint of absent children.

A month ago there were about a hundred homes in this county where they had only one meal a day, and there were over forty extreme cases where the families had only one meal in two days. But to-day they all are reasonably sure of at least two meals, but I fancy it is a very thin porridge in most cases.

So much for the joy part. Much remains that is too saddening to be told. The number of absolutely destitute persons is rapidly increasing. A month ago in this county there were only about 3000 persons in desperate need. The last count taken a week ago gives 6,662, more than double. This of course must be the fact. All the daikon and dried grape leaves and edible roots are completely used up, and there are hundreds of families on their last week of food. Farmers who own an acre or two of paddy fields are being forced to sell, and the average price has fallen to one half and less. When once their little farms are sold, these people fall hopelessly into the class of paupers. It is pitiable to see how they long for work even on scantiest wages in hopes of maintaining their independence. A few days ago work on the roads was begun for men and women, the average price being seventeen sen a day; about 400 persons gathered to do one piece of work, the majority of them being not yet on the list of free distribution, and they were turned away until the larger public works, such as opening new tracts of farm lands and the reformation of the paddy fields, begin. Unless these almost daily snow storms soon cease so that wide public works can be opened, the number of destitute will double within two weeks.

I asked the County Chief whether these half starved men and women could really work when called out. He said it was almost impossible for them to do more than go through the motions until they had eaten substantial food for two or three days. He also said that where people had been forced to live on exceedingly diluted gruel for weeks, their faces became livid and swollen with a sort of dropsy. The death rate is being looked into, and local officials acknowledge it is large. Of course it must be.

There is, to sum up, a rapidly increasing number of destitute people. The Yokohama Committee, by sending us 4,000 yen enabled us to make our second distribution of 16,000 yen. We hope to make a third distribution of 15,000 yen more in about two weeks. Money in considerable sums is coming from America to individuals of our committee and to other foreigners who use us as distributors. We believe the Red Cross Society will be prompt in placing their foreign donations in the hands of the local officials. But it makes one tired and weak to see the lamentable misery and wretchedness and broken homes and broken hearts of these poor people.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The first part of a thoughtful essay entitled "The New Era of Civilisation," appears in the February Taiyō. The writer is Dr. Anezaki. There is perhaps no scholar in this country who takes a keener interest in the spiritual life of nations than Dr. Anezaki. For all high ideals he has the most intense admiration. With the progress of philosophic and religious thought in Europe and America he is intimately acquainted, and it seems to be his highest ambition to fill the rôle of seer to his fellow-countrymen. As a writer he occupies a field of his own; for it is rare to find a man in this country who is so essentially unworldly as Dr. Anezaki. He tells us in this article that Japan and the whole Western world are alike entering on a new era of enlightenment. It is not only in business, in finance, in politics, in social life that great changes are taking place. In the world of thought and in religion, says Dr. Anezaki, old foundations are giving way, bringing down the huge structures that have been reared on them. There is discontent with past achievements everywhere. In the world of religion and ethics this is specially seen. The orthodox Protestant faith has been quite undermined by modern criticism. The attitude of Christians towards other religions which for centuries was one of ignorant antipathy, has changed into sympathetic study and appreciation. In the United States many new forms of religion are springing up and the old faith is undergoing quite new developments. In England people are beginning anxiously to question the power of the Church as a reformer of men's lives (Konnichi no Kyōkai wa yakō no kankwa wo atayete oru ka to iu mondai ni kumon (苦悶) shi hajimete oru no de aru). In the worlds of art and literature the same upheaval and unrest are manifested everywhere. We in Japan, continues Dr. Anezaki, are of course greatly affected by what is taking place in the west and it is the duty of every serious-minded man among us to observe closely the spirit of the times and to move with the current when it flows in the right direction. In this country we have grown accustomed to the most tremendous transformations in thought, in politics, and in morality. Feudalism has gone, the old class system exists no more, the heretofore privileged classes are privileged no more, and individual liberty has become universal. In morality the very basis of our system has been changed and among the majority of our people utility is the one test applied to all actions. In religion Buddhism and Christianity are influencing each other in various ways, the doctrines of the one not infrequently throwing light on those of the other. Our literature is rapidly changing. Both the prose and the poetry of pre-Meiji days are being abandoned in favour of styles that are occidental in origin. It is the same with regard to art. As regards her civilisation Japan has just entered her spring season. The snows that had taken centuries to accumulate have melted away. Under the spell of a hundred fructifying influences our vegetation has displayed luxuriant growth. Our fields are decked with flowers of every clime. . . . But with such soil as we have in this country to-day, there is a danger of a wild growth of useless weeds. Western civilisation is composed of many elements. They are not all equally good by any means and never, on our part, has there been more need of care in selection than to-day. Our very success in the late war is apt to lead us astray. We are too ready to attribute that success to material causes, to the accuracy with which we imitated foreign ways. We are in danger of losing under modern influences our time-honoured reserve, modesty, self-control and contentment, and of adopting the ambitious restlessness and the keen pursuit of riches which show themselves everywhere in the Western world.

Dr. Anezaki maintains that the strength of the civilisation of a nation depends largely upon the strength of the bonds that bind society together. In Japan he thinks these bonds are specially strong; so he has no fear of disintegration setting in either in the near or the distant future. He occupies several closely printed pages in discussing the structure of Japanese society. He fully recognizes the need of replacing certain moral products of feudalism with ideas based on a different kind of authority. But he hopes the Japanese people will never lose their respect for authority nor their spirit of obedience. We cannot follow him further on this subject, but proceed to briefly summarize what he says on the bearing of religion on the new era of civilisation. In Dr. Anezaki's conception the nineteenth century as far as Europe and America were concerned was an age of intense materialism and realism. Individuals and nations alike placed material benefits and gains before everything else. Competition became so keen that altruism died out in many hearts. This kind of existence, where every man is for himself and the devil take the hindmost, in Dr. Anezaki's conception, is no other than the relapse of mankind to the wolf and tiger stage, where greed and power to seize and to hold decide the lots of men. It is affirmed by some that western civilisation has been advancing during the past 50 years, but Dr. Anezaki fails to see wherein the advance consists. Worldliness has increased, satisfaction with the ordinary comforts and conveniences of life has become growingly general up until a very recent date. But, guided by certain indications of the coming of a reaction in favour of idealism, Dr. Anezaki predicts that men will during the present century again fall back on religion as the one thing that can furnish an antidote to the intense egoism of the present age. That every form of civilisation existing in the world has been deeply influenced by the religious belief of various nations is undeniable. In Japan the nation's highest ideals have always been directly or indirectly connected with belief in the sacredness of certain principles, certain traditions and certain objects of worship. Self-sacrifice, devotion to superiors, deep respect for ancestors, and the like, have been at the very root of Japanese civilisation, and in her eagerness to follow in the wake of Europe and America in regard to material progress Japan must guard against losing the very heart and substance of that system of civilisation which has come down to her from a distant past.

In the Rikugō Zasshi (No. 301) a somewhat singular article appears, entitled "A Short History of my Theology," which proves to be an account of the attempt of an earnest-minded man, Mr. K. Kuzumi, to arrive at some satisfactory conclusion in reference to the existence of God. He started, he tells us, as an unconscious atheist. He thinks that almost everybody starts thus, whether he be the Pope of Rome or the Lord Chief Abbot of a big Buddhist sect (Donna Daijōjō demo, Roma Hōō demo, umarelate ni wa yūshin ronja de wa arimasu). The first notions about a Supreme Being are imparted to the mind by instructors of some kind or other. This instruction Mr. Kutsumi received as a boy from his parents. He was taught about nonosama (a child's word for Buddha) and about various Shin-tō deities, and his obligation to worship them was impressed on him. When he went to school, he tells us, the teachers impressed on him the fact that Japan is essentially the land of the gods, there being no less than eight hundred myriads of such beings hovering in space over these sunny isles. So he settled down to be a polytheist, albeit an unconscious one; for so far his consciousness had revealed to him absolutely nothing. Being told that he must believe what was taught him on religious subjects, he blindly accepted the doctrines. But they had not the slightest effect on his life. He was then a bad, mischievous lad and headstrong in everything. And now, leaving out the less important passages, we will allow Mr. Kuzumi, who, be it known is a well educated man, to tell his own tale in the first person:—There are few boys worse than I was at that time as far as downright mischief goes. I was fond of playing all sorts of pranks (warujare) on passers-by. One of these was to put small snakes in a cake bag and then to throw down the bag for somebody to pick up while I watched him or her from behind some obstacle. Many of these tricks of mine were so bad that I expected that the gods of whom I had heard so much would certainly punish me. As they did nothing, I at once began to doubt their existence. Shortly after this my grandmother, who belonged to the Nichiren sect, commenced to take me to hear sermons at the temple. At first I was greatly bored by it, but eventually got interested in all the preacher told us about the wonderful doings of Nichiren. I began to think that gods and divinities were real beings after all. But having a practical mind, I decided that I would put this question to a fair test. We had an image of Nichiren in our house. So one day I removed this image from the altar and, taking it outside, I submitted it to the greatest indignities possible. Subsequently I restored it to its place and waited to see what punishment I should get for this insult to the divinity. When nothing happened I became more and more confirmed in the belief that no such beings as gods exist. This was my state of mind when I gradually grew into manhood. I studied Chinese under a man who had very strong anti-foreign feelings, and being very susceptible to the influence of those with whom I associate, I gradually imbibed his views. Later when I commenced to study English I regarded it as the language of a set of barbarians that was hardly worthy of serious attention. The man who taught me English had been the pastor of a Church, and he grew very fond of me and begged me to read the Bible. He gave me a copy, but I despised foreign things too much to even open it. Subsequently I was asked by this teacher whether I thought I could do my duty in the world unaided by a higher power. I felt then that I could not, but I knew that to say so was to acknowledge my need of Divine assistance. This I did not want to do, so I left him without replying. Next came into close contact with Messrs. Toyama and Yatabe's Spencerianism. Their arguments were welcomed by me as supporting my atheism. I thought then that I understood Spencer, but now I perceive this was only youthful conceit. At this time I commenced to lose my contempt for English and to study it with a will until I knew enough to read and understand pretty stiff works. Having reached that stage, I tackled the English translation of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason. That book taught me much, but at the same time raised in my mind a number of new doubts. It will be remembered that Kant makes it quite plain that all attempts to prove the existence of a Deity by speculative reasoning have signally failed. Whether God exists or not can not, according to him, be determined by reason. But while saying this, Kant declares himself to be a believer in the

† It is to Chap. III. of Book II. of Kant's Transcendental Dialectic that Mr. Kutsumi refers. Kant there discusses the only 3 possible modes of proving the existence of Deity on the grounds of speculative reason. He examines (1) The physico-theological argument; (2) the cosmological, and (3) the ontological argument. Kant asserts that each of these modes of proving God's existence has failed. He says, "I shall show it (the attempt to prove God's existence by speculative reason) is as unsuccessful on the one path—the empirical, as on the other—the transcendental, and that it stretches its wings in vain, to soar beyond the world of sense by the mere weight of speculative thought." In the concluding paragraph of Chap. III. Kant sums up the whole argument thus:—"A Supreme Being is therefore, for the speculative reason, a mere ideal, though a faultless one—a conception which perfects and crowns the system of human cognition, but the objective reality of which can neither be proved nor disproved by pure reason. If this defect is ever supplied by a Moral Theology, the problematic Transcendental Theology which has preceded, will have been at least serviceable as demonstrating the mental necessity existing for this conception, by the complete determination of it which it has furnished, and the ceaseless testing of the conclusions of a reason often deceived by sense and not always in harmony with its own ideas. The attributes of necessity, infinitude, unity, existence apart from the world (and not as a world-soul) eternally—free from conditions of time, omnipotence, and others, are pure transcendental predicates; and thus the accurate conception of a Supreme Being, which every theology requires, is furnished by transcendental theology alone."—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

existence of God. This dumfounded me. That a man like Kant should have been satisfied by the transcendental arguments whose inconclusiveness he takes such pains to show or should have been able to rest his faith in the existence of God on any other satisfactory basis, is certainly very surprising. His personal belief and his written arguments seemed to me to be irreconcilable with each other. But since a man of such enormous intellectual capacity as Kant was able to retain his belief, despite his failure to find for it a thoroughly rational basis, why should not I do the same? With this feeling, I commenced to read the Christian Bible earnestly and accepted its transcendental teaching. "God's nature," I said, "is beyond our comprehension, but it is plain that God exists. Our conception of the world would be incomplete did we not predicate this existence. And so I passed from the stage of unconscious atheism to that of conscious theism. But, as you will see, I had not reached the end of my theological journey by any means. Though I accepted at this time the Christian conception of God, I joined no Christian Church. I offered up no prayers. I sang no hymns of praise. To me there seemed to be an air of great hypocrisy about such Christian services as I attended. The words used by pastors in prayers often struck me as utterly silly. For instance, one pastor asks that God will grant special blessings to all assembled in his church; which is equivalent to asking an impartial Deity to be pleased to stoop to favoritism. The words used in hymns did not seem to me to represent in the least the real feelings of the persons singing these hymns. Christian services impressed me badly, but they did not lead me to condemn Christianity altogether, as I felt then that the creed was better than the men and women who professed it. I even went so far as to defend Christianity against the attacks of certain conservative educationists (Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō and his fellow-thinkers). But as the years went by and my mind reached its maturity, I argued to myself thus:—In the opinion of the deepest thinkers that which is beneath the phenomena of the universe, call it what we may, clothe it with what attributes we may, is to us absolutely unknowable. What creeds like Christianity teach about God rests only on the imagination. To say that God is capable of love or hatred, to supply the world with an exhaustive list of the traits He is supposed to have does not help us at all to understand the real nature of God. This God of the religious is an invented God rather than a real one. (Sunawachi shiru wo ubekarasaru hasu no mono wa katta ni shitte furi wo suru no de aru. Kore sunawachi kosaiku (小細工) wo motte seiso shita mono de, sono jitsu wa harera no sōō ni hoka naranu no de aru. Watakushi wa kayōna ningen no kosaiken ni natta Kami wa nai to iu no de aru)* If it be true that what is known as the real substance (本質) of the universe is God, and that real substance has an actual existence, it is quite plain that we finite beings whose intelligence is of a comparatively low order can never know God. So I come to the conclusion that there is no God that we can know. I am then an atheist in the sense that I can affirm that to us human beings no knowable God exists.† The stages of theological thought through which I have passed are these:—(1) I began with unconscious atheism. (2) I passed on to superstitious polytheism. (3) This drove me back to atheism of an arbitrary type. (4) Thence by the process described above I reached a stage of con-

* "It amounts to this that it is made to appear as though a Being who cannot possibly be known at all is most thoroughly known. This Being is the product of human handicraft. He has no existence outside the imagination of the fabricators. I affirm that the God that is the product of human handicraft has no real existence."

† Mr. Kusumi's meaning is quite plain, but when he declares himself an atheist, he will not escape the charge of being illogical. Nobody can prove the non-existence of God. The usual signification given to the term Atheist is not that in which Mr. Kusumi seeks to use it. It is applied to a person who asserts that there is no God, knowable or unknowable. We fear that Mr. Kusumi's attempt to divest the epithet of its objectionableness and illogicalness will not succeed. (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

scious monotheism. (5) But not finding any logical resting-place there, I passed on to conscious atheism (Tsui ni konnichi no ishiki aru mushin ronja to natta no de aru). This is of course a contradiction in terms. Of the non-existence of God there can not possibly be any consciousness. As consciousness, after all, only embraces a very limited area and God may exist in the region beyond, to make consciousness or non-consciousness the test of His existence or non-existence is of course quite absurd.

The Japanese Unitarians are naturally much interested in the controversy that has been carried on in America over the exclusion of the Unitarians from the Religious Conference held by Protestant Sects in New York last November. The Rikugō Zasshi gives a full and clear epitome of the various opinions on the subject. It is maintained by some religious newspapers in the States that among those attending the Conference there were many who held Unitarian views. No doctrinal tests were applied to these gentlemen and hence, it is affirmed, that to exclude such excellent men as Mr. Eliot, the President of the American Unitarian Association was a mistake. Several prominent men of evangelical views write in this sense. But the Independent (Congregational) and the Church Standard (Episcopal) defend the action of the Conference, arguing that had the Unitarians been asked to send Delegates, the Roman Catholics and even the Mormons would have had to be invited to join the Conference also. It is added that the Conference was called by men of Evangelical views and that the conveners felt bound to confine it to men who hold these views. Unitarian organs sneer at the whole thing as only a make-believe union which does nothing more than temporarily conceal the jealousies and pettiness of certain sectarians. This to a large extent is the feeling expressed by the Roman Catholic organs also. To the Roman Catholics the whole movement appears as an attempt to effect the impossible.

The Nichiyō Sōshi (Protestant-Episcopal) thinks that it is high time a Japanese Bishop were consecrated. To this consummation, it tells us, the Episcopal Church has been looking forward for some time past. The present seems a suitable time for pressing the matter. This organ thinks that within the next three years the project may be carried out.

Writing on the education of catechists the Nichiyō Sōshi says that of late there has been much complaint of the lack of education displayed by evangelists. Some people expect too much in this line, but there is no denying that in some quarters there is too great a tendency to rely on spiritual influences only. "To study nothing, to read nothing, to pass no time in quiet meditation, to undertake no research, but only to wait for the moving of the Spirit, is to expect the miraculous to happen. Such a method of carrying on evangelistic work is ridiculous (katahara itaki kagiri to iubeshi). If a catechist has no more general knowledge than that possessed by a Middle School student, it is not to be expected that he can act as teacher to a high school student; still less that he should be able to influence a University student. Catechists cannot be expected to possess minute knowledge of special subjects like science and philosophy; but they should be able to explain the Bible in a clear and intelligible manner. "Considered as the application of the theology they have studied, or as the practical exposition of the Bible, the free and easy (slovenly) and flavourless sermons and conversations in which our catechists seem to delight may indeed be pronounced to be one of the greatest drawbacks that our Church has to bear."

tion respecting the future world refers to the existence of a Heaven and a Hell, my answer is that I have never given any thought to the subject, and hence I am unable to say whether they exist or not.

(5) Mr. Shiga Chōkō.—Being a very ordinary man, I do not feel qualified to treat such a lofty subject as that on which you ask my opinion. Practical questions connected with religion interest me more than speculative ones. At the seat of war Christianity has shown itself to be a very practical religion. It adapted the help given to our troops to their special circumstances in an excellent way, and though to do this involved some outlay, it found the money. I am not a Christian; but I have great admiration for this kind of thing. There are I know religious teachers who affirm that the practical application of religion occupies a lower level than the investigation of such questions as those you have propounded, that it is the throwing of light on the deeper questions of life that is the true function of religion. That may be so. But if such vast importance is to be attached to the future life, then surely it behoves priests to teach mortal men how to die well, that is, how to overcome death and enter that changeless, blissful state we call paradise. Religious teachers should be men of spotless purity and deep faith, who live a life superior to that of ordinary mortals, whose views of life and death are on an infinitely higher level than those of the common herd of mankind. But the Buddhist priests who went to the front as teachers and comforters of the sick and the dying in the late war displayed none of this superiority to other men. On the contrary, they showed themselves to be below the level of the common soldier. One would have thought that the calm, fearless way in which many of these soldiers died while smiling and chatting would have been felt to be a reproach to the men whose profession it is to teach men how to die. But this did not happen. While work that Buddhist priests ought to do, is left undone, it is no time for them to amuse themselves by propounding speculative questions as to the existence of a future state. This it seems to me is the only answer that your questions call for. On the subject of my letter, I should be glad to hear what the propounders of the questions sent to me have to say.

(6) Mr. Sakai Kōren.—Really, I can't suppose that a future life is possible. This is my enlightened view.

(7) Mr. Ishikawa Sanjiro.—Since I actually exist in this world, it appears to me there must be a future life. But regarded from our present point of view it seems to be no more than a dream.

(8) Rev. R. Minami.—You ask for my views on a future life. I will tell you what I habitually think on this subject. I believe there is a future life. My belief is founded on the fact that mind and body each has its own separate existence. This being so, since the soul exists now separate from the body there is nothing to prevent its continuing to exist. This is a logical conclusion to draw. But some people will ask, how about the connection between body and mind? We are not able to give a satisfactory, metaphysical explanation of this subject. As regards the nature of the future life, we think that our individual consciousness will continue to exist and it may be that those ethical aspirations of which Kant writes will be satisfied during that life. There is no reason why intellectual development should not still go on. As to details, we have no means of knowing them. But we see no need for suppressing speculation on these points. What I have said above on the future state may all be dismissed as mere speculation. But granted that man is a moral being, these speculations respecting his future are nothing but inductions which it is reasonable for us to draw. In the life of man it often proves that mental speculation is more important than known facts. It effects more in the world than the mere knowledge of facts. He who does not recognize this is not qualified to appreciate philosophy, or literature, art or religion.

We read in the Kirisutokyo Sekai that the total income of the Congregational Japanese Mission any Society (Nihon Dendō Kaisha) last year was 7,789 yen 69 sen and the total expenditure 7,996 yen 44 sen. Among the items of expenditure are the following:—Salaries, 4,352 yen; Traveling expenses, 750 yen; Printing, 237 yen 80 sen; Grant-in-aid to the newspaper (Kirisutokyo Sekai), 200 yen. Cost of the residence of an Evangelist in Korea, 180 yen. Cost of a preaching place there, 360 yen. A very large sum, 583 yen 22 sen, is put down under the heading sengen undō-hi, cost of making known and stirring up interest in our declaration of principles and policy.

The Kirisutokyo Sekai says that many questions have been asked in reference to the Churches taken over by the Kumiai Kyōkai. So for the information of all persons interested in this new movement, the following facts are stated in the form of questions and answers. We reproduce them in a curtailed form.

Question.—What was it especially that led to the Kumiai Kyōkai's taking such decided steps towards independence as the recent movement implies? What is the leading characteristic of the movement?

Answer.—That mission work in Japan should be carried on by Japanese has from the very first day of its establishment been the conviction of the leading members of the Kumiai Kyōkai and of the missionaries of the American Board. Certain members of our church, regarding the recent marvellous national development as affording a unique opportunity for taking a big stride towards thorough independence, put themselves into communication with the Missionaries of the American Board, and after a series of conferences succeeded in making arrangements for our taking over the churches which hitherto have been dependent on help received from the foreign Mission Board. Thus have we carried out at a stroke the original policy of the Congregational Church in Japan.

Question.—Will the preaching places taken over from the foreign Mission Board henceforth be named Kumiai Kyōkai preaching places?

Answer.—In principle they will occupy the position of Kumiai Kyōkai churches, so there would be no objection to their being so named, but as long as they receive help from a Missionary Society they will not form a part of the thoroughly independent and self-supporting Congregational Churches of Japan.*

Question.—What has been settled as to the amount of money annually to be subscribed by the newly received churches to the Kumiai-Kyōkai Missionary Society?

Answer.—This is left to the decision of each of these churches. This is the practice followed in the case of all our Congregational Churches.

Question.—Will the newly-received Churches have the right of sending representatives to the General Congregational Synods?

Answer.—This will depend on the amount of money annually subscribed for Church work by each church. This rule has been invariably applied to all Congregational Churches in Japan.

Question.—Will the pastors of the newly received Churches become members of the General Synod?

Answer.—Not necessarily. As pastors simply they will have no such right. Like the pastors of other non-self-supporting bodies they will be able to attend the Synods as extra-members and make propositions, and the like, but will not be entitled to vote.

Question.—Will the Nihon Kumiai-Kyōkai make arrangements with the newly received Churches for the ordination of pastors, the organization and formal establishment of churches and the like?

Answer.—Most certainly they will.

Question.—Will statistical reports bearing on the newly-received churches be published annually and circulated by the Nihon Kumiai-Kyōkai?

Answer.—They will.

Question.—What will be the attitude of the Business Managers of the Kumiai-Kyōkai to the newly received churches?

* Kumiai-Kyōkai no meshō wo itadiku ni nan no sashitsutaye mo kore nakarubeki sorayedomo, dokuritsū dōshitaru Nihon Kumiai-Kōkai no ichibu ni wa, kore naku sōru.

Answer.—They will be expected like other churches to aim at eventual self-support, but while in receipt of grants-in-aid from the Japanese Missionary Society they will be treated like all semi-dependent bodies, being periodically visited by officers of the general business department of the Nihon Kumiai Kyōkai.

Question.—What will be the status of foreign Missionaries under the new arrangement?

Answer.—Precisely what it has been heretofore. They will help in the development of the native churches and they will have the right to attend the General Synods as extra-members and to make speeches or bring forward propositions there.

The Methodists of America and Canada a short time ago held a Conference at Baltimore which had for its object the union of several large bodies of Methodists. But it dissolved without effecting anything. The members of the Conference could not agree as to the number of years the President of the united Church should remain in office. The Gokyo is disappointed to find that the leading Methodists of Canada and America allowed such a comparatively trivial matter as the tenure of office of the President to prevent the effecting of a union which would bring a number of permanent benefits in its train. Had this happened in Japan, observes the Gokyo, we should have been lectured by our brethren across the water for lack of common-sense and for our narrow-mindedness. After this fiasco among Methodists on the other side of the Pacific, it would be most unwise for Japanese Methodists to rely too much on the help of the foreign Missionaries who have been appointed by our Church to take steps for the effecting of a union of Japanese Methodist Churches.

Commenting on the spirit of the age as regards religious thought, a recent number of the Fukui Shimpō says:—Within the past few years there has been manifested a growing desire to sink all minor differences and to unite on big broad issues. There are not a few who hold that manipulated by skilful chemists Buddhist and Christian materials can be made into a pill that will be sought after by the public generally. Here in Japan Christian sects are all anxious for union. As for doctrines and dogmas, they should not be allowed to keep earnest-minded men apart, says the new school of thinkers. As long as the name "Christian" is retained, inquiry and discussion and belief may be made quite free. The great thing is to get rid of differences. On this rapid growth of latitudinarianism the Dokuritsū Hyōron (Independent Review) observes:—Mr. Abe Isoo, who a little time ago left the Congregationalists to join the Unitarians, has now returned to the Kumiai Kyōkai. Asked the reason of this, he replied:—"The Congregationalists now have no objection to my being a member of their body while holding Unitarian views."

Christian Summer schools and the Young Men's Christian Association in Tōkyō which hitherto have been run on orthodox lines have now commenced to open their doors to such heterodox teachers as the Rev. D. Ebina. The Gokyo, (Methodist) has recently adopted a very liberal attitude towards individual belief, says the Dokuritsū Hyōron. As far as logic and consistency allow, it welcomes all shades of opinion. Whether the Kumiai Kyōkai doctrinal door has been actually thrown open wide enough to admit Unitarians is open to question, says the Fukui Shimpō. Whether such a course would be logical or consistent many people would doubt. But as to the general tendency to sacrifice a great deal for the sake of more union in the religious world, it never was stronger than it is to-day, not only in Japan, but also in England and America. It is felt that in recent years Christian sects in their divided state have found the opposing forces too strong for them. Here in Japan we have neither the men nor the money to effect great things in the way of evangelization while split up into a number of small sects. The great trust system has begun to make its influence felt in the Churches. The path of efficiency and economy combined lies in this direction. But the doctrinal effects of the new movement constitute a big subject worthy of the deepest attention. Union implies compromise. How far may compromise be carried without invoking the total disintegration of Christianity as a distinctive creed? This is the question of questions in Japan at the present moment.

PROGRESS.

CAROLYN WELLS IN THE FEBRUARY "CENTURY."

Triumphant Art! Proudly we see to-day
Thy colored pictures in the magazines;
Perfervid pigments vividly portray
The atmosphere of realistic scenes.

Here note a maid, with rich plum-colored cheek,
Plucking red-flannel roses from a tree;
Green and vermillion clouds with feeling reek,
And pale-pink ships float in an ochre sea.

Again, behold in violet evening dress
A youth beneath an orange chandelier;
His light-green face aglow with happiness,
He murmurs in his love's magenta ear.

What matter, then, the lithographic slips
Which show a bright-green blossom scarlet-leaved.

Or crimson teeth laughing 'twixt pure white lips,
Since color-process pictures we've achieved?

Winter still dallies in the lap of Spring and as a consequence the Hockey Match between ladies of Tokyo and Yokohama had to be postponed on Saturday, snow still covering the ground. ## YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

There was again a good attendance at the fortnightly meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society, held in Van Schaick Hall on Friday evening. The lecture by Mr. E. B. Clarke on "Gensai Murai," the most popular novelist in Japan at the present time, was read in his absence by the Rev. J. L. Dearing, D.D. We give the major portion of Mr. Clarke's remarks below, but would add that they were copiously illustrated by translations from Gensai Murai's works, which, to our regret, are too lengthy for reproduction in our columns. The paper began as follows:—

Just as England has her Marie Corelli and Hall Caine, so Japan has her Gensai Murai. Unlike his foreign craft-brethren in the general trend of his thought, but like them writing with a purpose and like them reprobated of critics, sneered at by literary virtuosi, in the hearts of quite ordinary folk Murai occupies a niche apart. Other writers number their readers by hundreds, Murai his by thousands. Indeed, when his Kui-Doraku came out in book form, after running a whole year in the Hochi Shimbun as its daily feuilleton, although the work—it was in four volumes, viz. Spring, Summer, Autumn, Winter—was probably the most expensive of its kind, the publishers could not keep pace with the demand, and the materials for making the covers were exhausted! He has accomplished a rare feat in adding a new word to the vocabulary of the language. Now-a-days when a Japanese wishes to describe a girl graduate who is forward, ungainly, frumpish, conceited, a Tony Lumpkin in skirts, he says she is an Ungakujoshi, using the name of a female character in the novel called Hinode-jima. If great popularity, if success, be any test of merit, then assuredly is Gensai Murai a great novelist. The affectionate eagerness with which the general public read his books is caused by the scientific simplicity, the naivete, of the language he employs in delineating his characters and situations. His prose is clear, flexible, vivid and thoughtful. He disdains the laboured style of le cisteire. What you have to say, say it in the simplest manner, so that he who runs may read and understand and bring forth fruit; that is his attitude. Thus he has achieved a direct, forthright style which is as different from popular notions of Oriental luxury of imagery and "pomp of phrase" as a Shinto shrine is different from a Buddhist temple; a style, indeed, marvellously akin to genuine Attic eloquence. His conception of a writer is that he is a teacher and as such he must use the language and style best calculated to attract and instruct ignorance.

Of what avail are beautiful words, ink-horn terms, involved sentences, if the reformer be unread by those who most require his teachings? Unmindful of the basic qualities, the universal characteristics which bind man to man, many modern writers plume themselves on verbal and technical acquirements which only serve to "mystify le bourgeois," as Balzac said of his unintelligible sentences, and look down on a writer like Gensai who uses such simple language that anyone knowing the kana (the Japanese syllabary) can easily read it. Let them, if they will, write for the learned; he, rather, will cater to the uncultured, and strive as best he may to raise them to higher levels of life and thought. So Gensai writes for the common people, and the common people receive him gladly.

There is nothing of the charlatan about him. His works are marked by a rare sincerity. His types are familiar to all his readers, but there is nothing hackneyed in his treatment. He is master of the technique of his art. The joys and sorrows of his characters are mainly drawn from the experiences of his own strangely varied life. A man of keen vision, who sees deeply into the soul of things, he has evolved from these experiences, wise thoughts, noble thoughts, helpful thoughts; and he speaks because his heart is full of a strong and earnest desire to help and encourage his fellow-men who are staggering beneath the ever-increasing fardels of this too strenuous age. His guiding principle may be summed up in one untranslatable Japanese word, kakugo. The nearest I can get to it is "grit," self-mastery, endurance of soul. Kakugo makes the man, and education and culture are the means of intensifying kakugo. A man with this principle is respected and honoured even though he have neither education nor culture. (Mr. Murai attributes to the lack of kakugo all cases of divorce. He thinks the parties had no kakugo in them to be husbands and wives.)

In their light-reading the Japanese are very sentimental, sympathetic and weeping ripe. They follow with intensest interest all the vicissitudes that befall the hero and heroine of a novel, shedding tears over their trials and suffering and rejoicing with exceeding great joy when faithful love is rewarded and villainy routed. But Murai is sane, healthy; a strong vein of true humour runs through all his writings, and, steadfast to his kakugo, he avoids any tendency to a maudish sentimentality. He seldom, if ever, "kills" as the Japanese expression has it, persons who appear in his works; in this making a good contrast to Ryuro, a well known novelist.

All Murai's moral teachings are conveyed indirectly through his stories, for he is of opinion that "Men must be taught as if you taught them not,

And things unknown proposed as things forgot."

Thus, in 1902, he published Sake-Doraku, (The Pleasures of Drinking), and by means of this novel he has furthered the cause of temperance to an incredible degree. Again, in his most popular book, the Kui-Doraku (Pleasures of Housekeeping) he has given expression to his ideas on the training of girls, not so much in what is called the higher learning, as in those arts which go to the making up of a truly womanly woman, in whom a husband may find help, and comfort and joy, and the children loving advice and care. Mr. Murai's ideal woman might be described almost in the words of the little fat friar anent Maid Marian: "Meekness and mildness, and softness, and gentleness, and tenderness, and humility, and obedience to her husband, and domesticity, or, as learned doctors call it, the faculty of stay-at-homeliness, and embroidery, and music, and pickling, and preserving and the whole complex and multiplex details of the noble science of dinner, as well in preparation for the table, as in arrangement over it, and in distribution around it to knights and squires.....these are female virtues." Interspersed through the narrative are over six hundred recipes for cooking food in native and foreign ways and all these recipes were well tested by the author's wife before they were included.

I had expressed a desire to meet Mr. Murai, and my friend, Mr. Unkichi Kawai, professor of English Literature at the Meiji Jo-Gakko, and English editor of the Hochi Shimbun, undertook to arrange an interview. A few days later a message came over the telephone inviting me to Count Okuma's residence at Waseda where the popular writer, cousin by marriage to the famous statesman, was then staying.

At the time appointed we left Hongo in our jirikisha, rattling through the quiet streets gay with flags and lanterns in celebration of the glorious victory at Mukden. Reaching Waseda in due course, we were ushered into a study furnished in foreign style and warmed by a cheerful gas-fire in the grate. Mr. Murai was awaiting us and gave us courteous welcome. He is a man of fine presence, tall and spare, with an ascetic cast of countenance which reminded me somewhat of the faces of Samurai in old nishiki e (coloured broadsides) or on the kiku-ningyo (chrysanthemum-figures) at Dango-zaka in the autumn. It is a serious face, the face of a thinker, lighted up at whites by a charming smile, child-like and frank.

After the usual compliments and deprecations he showed us round the conservatory—one of only three private conservatories in the whole of this so-called flower-loving land of Japan, the inhabitants of which say hana yori dango, "dumplings rather than flowers!" Hana yori hana no shita! As we strolled about Mr. Murai told me something of himself and of his methods.

"I was born at Toyosaki, in the province of Sanshu, in the third year of Bunkyo (1863), on the 18th day of October. I came into this world, you see, at the very beginning of the transition period and all my early life was passed in the bustle and confusion and alarms and excursions that marked that stormy time. I, even I, quiet and sedate as I appear, have been under fire, for I was in the Yashiki (mansion and grounds of a Japanese of the upper class) of our lord at Uyeno when shot and shell pierced and tore the building in the famous one-day battle on Uyeno hill between the Imperialists and the forces of the Shogun, and my uncle was slain in the fight of the next day. My mother and my grandfather brought me up, for my father was too busy attending to our feudal lord, Matsudaira Izu-no-kami, at Kyoto, to pay much attention to his own domestic affairs.

Although my training, based on ancient samurai teaching, was of a nature most severe, I had almost said cruel, yet I look back on those days with pleasure and think with grateful affection of my love-worthy mother, and of my kindhearted yet stern old grandfather. All that I am now and those poor qualities in my books for which men praise me, I owe to the discipline of my childhood. That discipline differs from that which obtains now in the entire lack of coddling. In the old days, we wore, for instance, no caps, no mufflers, no woollen under-garments; monme was our only wear, yet we were none the worse. Children were not allowed to express any personal preference. What was given to us to eat, that we had to eat or go hungry; what we were ordered to do, that we had to do. Sent out in the depth of winter barefooted in the snow at night, cheerfully and readily we had to go, however much we might fear the darkness and shun the cold. It is due to this training that I can now turn to tasks in themselves intensely disagreeable, nay, more, repugnant, to me, and do them without hesitation.

When the samurai gave up their rights and privileges a large number took to trade, but accustomed only to the knightly code of conduct, they were bewildered in the mazes of the code commercial, and many were ruined. Among them, my father, but, fortunately for us, our lord had a high opinion of his merits and appointed him tutor to the noble family, and thus he was able to provide us with bread if not with fishes. He taught me until I was fourteen and then I entered the Daigaku Nankō, now the Imperial Tokyo University, with a scholarship. I soon had to resign it and regretfully leave the university, as, owing to my ignorant zeal in studying, my health had become seriously impaired.

The years that followed were years of experiment. We were poor and I tried to assist my father to support the family. I tried my hand at many trades; for I had not yet found my metier; by turns I was proof-reader in a newspaper office, clerk, pedlar, house-boy is a Russian family in San Francisco, worker in a tobacco factory in the same place; then back again in Japan. I dabbled in various fruitless projects; then became school-teacher, merchant, labourer. "At length the good hour came," and I found my true vocation, for, thanks to Mr. Yano, then chief editor of the Hochi Shimbun, who had approved of an article I had sent him, I secured a position, on the staff of that newspaper. In the intervals of my journalistic work I wrote several novels, and to my joy and surprise, I found that popularity had attached itself to my pen, and that people were beginning more and more to look to me for advice and encouragement in the battle of life. They seem to regard me to be, as it were, a missionary to the age. A publisher of school books asked me for some moral stories of children, and I wrote "Kibun Daijin" and "Oni Seijin", both of which, I am proud to say, are regarded with high favour by all classes of people. By the way, the former, translated by Mr. Masao Yoshida, ran as a serial in St. Nicholas a year or so ago, and the latter has also been translated by the same gentleman for the English reading public. My first didactic novel was Tsuru-Doraku (Pleasures of Fishing); this had great influence on parents and, through them, on the upbringing of children. Then followed Sake-Doraku, and I take great delight in the fact that this book has led many to forsake the pleasures of the wine-cup for others less deadly, and I have letters in my possession from grateful wives and mothers—one from an admiral in our navy—thanking me for having written the tale. But it will amuse you to hear thatmas description of the Drunkard's progress was so realistic I have been violently accused of being a drunkard myself!

"In 1894, the proprietors of the Hochi Shimbun thought well enough of me to entrust me with the sole management of the paper. Mr. Yano had left us for Government service two or three years before and the Hochi was in a bad way. The circulation had fallen to a meagre thirty-five hundred. I had, however, a free hand and loyal support, and with some expenditure of time and energy, I succeeded in placing the paper on a better footing. At present I am glad to say our circulation is probably the largest in the Empire."

Mr. Murai's modesty would not permit him to say that this vast improvement in the status of the Hochi Shimbun was due to himself. But, as a matter of fact, when he put his "uphill shoulder to the wheel," his energy and enthusiasm kindled in his subordinates a like energy and enthusiasm, so that one and all worked with a single mind and aim to rescue the paper from the slough into which it had fallen and raise it to the position it now occupies as one of the most influential organs in the Empire.

While Japan was engaged in the epoch-making and vital war with Russia, Gensai Murai was more than ever busy, not only with his purely editorial work, but in works voluntary, and therefore more arduous, for the sake of the soldiers fighting "red-wetshod" in Manchuria, and of the wives and widows and children they left in the care of the nation for whose existence they were dying.

On the outbreak of the war he wrote and distributed among the men of the Army and Navy a little book which he called Gunshi Tokuhon (Pocket Monitor for Men of War), containing a wealth of good advice on the treatment of the soldier himself and of the enemy. General Fukushima and Admiral Count Kabayama both expressed very great approval of the little work; the former, indeed saying it was of more timely value than a regiment of artillery. A few extracts may be of interest:—

"Bear in mind day and night that you are a soldier of the Emperor of Japan. Preserve your honour at any cost. Do not plunder the enemy. Respect the chastity of women of the enemy. Commit no unseen crime; remember your conscience sees you always, and let it be your strict guard." "However cruelly the enemy may treat you, it is because they are ignorant; therefore be cool and act with reason, and never treat them in a vengeful spirit." "Duty should be regarded more than life. True bravery is not in throwing away one's life or in courting death, but in doing one's duty at the hazard of one's life." "It is glory and honour to the warriors if they die in battle, but, remember, it is a disgrace to die of intemperance and neglect of rules of good sanitation and health, when their lives are so much needed at their posts."

These extracts are taken from "Hana, a Daughter of Japan" in which the "Gunshi Tokuhon" is quoted and which Mr. Murai wrote for translation into English "to make known to the world the characteristics of the Japanese people." This work has been very favourably reviewed by the home papers and he has followed it with another, a historic novelette, called "Aokya, or the Ordeal by Music."

I learnt from Mr. Kawai that the novelist is very regular in his methods of composing. All his stories are first thought out to the minutest detail, with much tribulation and groaning of the spirit. The whole scheme having been passed through the alembic of his mind, the mere mechanical process of writing is done with great ease and rapidity. Mr. Murai does not believe in the inspiration theory. He holds that a man ought to have full power over himself to do or not to do; if not, what is he better than the beasts that perish? Therefore every morning he sits at his desk from seven of the clock and writes till midday. The afternoon he gives up to business and amusements. Journalist, poet, writer of books and plays, director of the Manufacturers' Association, lover of the theatre, he touches life at many points, and is actively interested in them all. He delights in the rod and the cue, and is a good shot both with the bow and the gun. He is not what is styled a great reader, preferring rather to see with his own eyes and to think his own thoughts. A man of great purity of life, he has never wallowed in the slime-bath of dissipation; in this he is, as in his happy family intimacies, a very living evangel to his countrymen. He has two healthy children, and in his wife he is blessed with a woman who, of Samurai birth and highly educated, can enter freely into his thoughts and feelings and be to him a helpmeet rare and tender and true.

During our conversation, Count Okuma joined us and interjected several amusing obiter dicta, one or two of which I may be permitted the indiscretion of quoting. "Unless you can eat mutton and thoroughly enjoy its peculiar flavour, you cannot call yourself a true Hai-kara-to." Hai-kara-to is a name given in derision to certain young men who, educated abroad, have returned with a taste for things foreign, contemning "things Japanese." The name is presumably derived from High-Collar, to meaning party. Hai-kara may also mean, from the sound, Ashes-empty, significant of the opinion held of the members of that party by sane Japanese.

We discussed with much laughter and amusement the Fujitsu romances of an American writer on that very popular system of self defence. His wonderful knowledge of a Japan that has no earthly existence aroused our admiration, and we all expressed a fervent desire to go a land where no rheumatism, nor indigestion, nor consumption could be found; in this actual Japan all three diseases are everywhere rife; in fact, the two latter are the direst scourges of a people whose knowledge of food-values and of hygiene is of the scantiest. Mr. Murai remarked that it was rather unusual for a Westerner to devote such wholesale eulogies to an Eastern people, for the usual attitude of the foreigner was "can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Count Okuma replied: "Well, you know, we used to regard ourselves as descendants of the gods and the rest of the world as barbarians. Every nation has its own special jiman (self-praise), but I must confess that I know of none more impregnable and more seemingly unconscious than English jiman."

Under cover of the laughter raised by this dictum, we bowed our sayonara and came away well pleased with our afternoon at Waseda. It would be easy to fill a volume with chatter about the subject of my paper, but our time is limited. The lecturer closed with an extract from the novel called "Machi-isha, or the Town Doctor," which gave an excellent glimpse of Gensai's humour.

On the motion of the President a hearty vote of thanks was accorded Mr. Clarke for his paper. It threw light upon a subject possessing very great interest at the present time, the manner in which the intellectual cravings of the Japanese masses were being satisfied.

The musical portion of the programme was notable for the contributions of the Rev. J. Monroe Stick and the appearance of a new singer in Yokohama, Mr. Randall Hargreaves.

THE LAW COURTS.

PETITION FOR DEPRIVATION OF PARENTAL RIGHTS.

The case in which Mr. Jules Dubois, No. 26, petitions against Mrs. Julia Dubois, No. 64, Bluff, wife of the late Mr. Charles L. Dubois, asking for the deprivation of her parental rights over her children, came up again on March 2nd in the Yokohama District Const.

Sugiura, a second-hand goods dealer, of Motomachi, was summoned as a witness. He stated that he bought from Mrs. Julia Dubois on Dec. 1st seventy pieces of furniture and moveable property for yen 412. The Court ordered him to produce a list describing each article bought from the defendant and also the prices given for them.

Meanwhile, K. Midzuno, a watch dealer of Tokyo, was examined as a witness. He deposed that he was one of the acquaintances of the late Mr. Ch. L. Dubois. After the funeral, he paid a visit to the dwelling of the deceased. On this occasion, the Swiss Consul-General, M. Jules Dubois, and Mr. James Favre-Brandt were comparing the furniture and moveable property with an inventory which had been drawn up by the deceased long before his death. The total value of the articles aggregated about seven thousand yen. Witness being acquainted with these gentlemen helped them with the work. Afterwards Mrs. Julia Dubois sold articles to several Japanese second hand goods dealers. He did not know what amount she received for the furniture. Hearing of this sale by Mrs. Julia Dubois, Mr. James Favre-Brandt bought back a portion of the goods disposed of by her. The purpose of that gentleman in doing so seems to have been the maintenance of the home for the children. Witness heard through Mr. James Dubois and Mr. James Favre-Brandt of Osaka that Mrs. Julia Dubois travelled in December last to Nagasaki. He did not know what the purpose of that journey was.

At this stage, plaintiff's counsel asked that the farther examination be conducted behind closed doors. The Court said that there was no necessity for such a step. On resuming the examination, witness stated that according to Mr. James Dubois, defendant did not make any arrangements for her children's living when she left on her journey to Nagasaki. The mother of defendant, however, took care of the children. Asked by the Court as to the relations in the Dubois family, witness said that before the death of Mr. Charles L. Dubois everything was very harmonious. Later on conditions grew serious. It might be remarked that the mother, a younger sister and a brother of Mrs. Julia Dubois were living in the house together with her. Owing to the conduct of the defendant, her mother experienced great anxiety and alone attended to the bringing up of the children. On the other hand the mother advised the defendant to be a good mother. Sympathizing with the mother's humane feelings, the younger sister and brother supported the old woman. Naturally, a difference arose between defendant and her family.

The Court—What was the nature of the defendant's conduct? Witness—It would cause me great embarrassment to go into that question. Defendant was in deceased's employ before she became his wife. She has not received even a primary education and had not been brought up in a good home. Even the mother often complained to me about the defendant's bad conduct. At length, defendant ordered her mother, sister and brother to leave her dwelling. Plaintiff's counsel asked witness to give more minute details, but defendant's counsel objected. Pressed by the Court, witness replied that he did not know anything further regarding the woman.

Plaintiff's counsel said that the cause of the present case must be attributed to the conduct of the defendant. If witness's statement was found imperfect, the petition must be dismissed.

The witness was re-examined at great length by the Court, and then, after Sugiura had produced a list of furniture purchased by him from defendant, the case was adjourned.

CLAIM FOR SHORT DELIVERY OF CARGO.

The case instituted by Messrs. Siber, Wolff and Co., No. 90, Yamashita-cho, claiming yen 1,541.80 against the Ocean Steamship Co. and the China Mutual Steamship Co., whose Yokohama agents are Messrs. Butterfield and Swire, No. 7, came up on March 3rd in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nakanishi.

Plaintiffs were represented by Mr. S. Sawada and the defendants by Mr. M. Naruse.

At the outset of the hearing, plaintiff's Counsel stated that yen 1,329.60 of the amount was for two cases of white shirtings and one case of flannel—yen 630 and yen 699.60 respectively—being cargo still undelivered, and yen 212.20 was for customs duty and extraordinary tax paid for the foregoing three cases. As to the cause of the claim, Counsel said that the two cases of white shirtings were part of a lot of twenty cases with the mark, "S. W." and "244" in triangle with counter number 7280-7299 imported from England. Five cases of these were landed at Kobe. The remaining fifteen cases were transhipped to the Ocean Steamship Co.'s steamer Pyrrhus and brought to Yokohama, arriving on March 20th last. Twelve of the fifteen cases were delivered to the plaintiffs between April 17th and 25th and one further case on May 3rd. Two cases were still undelivered. The one case of flannel was among the lot marked "S. W." and "283" in triangle, imported from Glasgow on March 15th last year by the China Mutual Steamship Co.'s Pingsuey. Six cases were duly delivered to the plaintiffs between 15th and 29th April last. The plaintiffs had since repeatedly inquired of the defendants as to the shortage, but no satisfactory account was forthcoming.

While admitting the undertaking of the transportation of the goods, the defendant's Counsel said that the goods arrived safely at Yokohama and the plaintiffs might take delivery in due time on presenting their bills of lading to the landing agent of the defendants. The missing cases must have been stolen in the Customs compound through negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. Therefore the defendants had no responsibility.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that the defendants' Yokohama agents gave an endorsement on both the bills of lading as "Please deliver ex-Hatoba upon endorsement—Butterfield and Swire, per Charles W. Cooper." Consequently in this case the defendants could not free themselves from liability for the missing three cases.

Counsel produced evidence after which the hearing was adjourned till March 17th.

PETITION FOR DEPRIVATION OF PARENTAL RIGHTS.

This action, in which Mr. Jules Dubois, No. 26, Yamashita-cho, petitions for the deprivation of the parental rights of Mrs. Julia Dubois, the widow of the late Mr. Charles L. Dubois, came up again on March 5th in the Yokohama District Court. Judge Nagata delivered judgment dismissing the plaintiff's petition and ordering him to pay costs.

According to Mr. Nakamura, the plaintiff's Counsel, Mr. Jules Dubois will institute an appeal in the Tokyo Appeal Court against the present judgment.

CLAIM FOR RENT.

The hearing of a case filed by Mr. H. V. Gielen against Chong Fanking, a Chinese merchant, claiming thirty-six yen began on March 5th in the Yokohama District Court.

Plaintiff was represented by R. Ideura and the defendant by Mr. Y. Fujiwara.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that Mr. Gielen leased a building situated on lot No. 156, Yamashita-cho to the defendant in November, 1898, for a monthly rent of twelve yen payable in advance. The rent was duly paid up to the end of December, 1905, and since then no rent has been paid.

Defendant's Counsel contended that his client never did hire a building from the plaintiff and there was no responsibility for the plaintiff's claim. Counsel further said that the building in dispute has connexion with another house for which the parties were undergoing examination in the Tokyo Appeal Court. Referring to Art. 121 of the Procedure of the Civil Code, when a portion or the whole of a claim has a close connexion with another case still under examination, the Court shall suspend the hearing of the new claim until the first case be resolved,—the defendant asked the Court to estop temporarily the present claim.

Being questioned by the Court, the defendant's Counsel said that he was not willing to go into the details of the proceedings in the Tokyo Appeal Court.

Plaintiff's Counsel having no objection, the Court decided to temporarily suspend the hearing.

PETITION IN BANKRUPTCY.

An action filed by Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co. asking for a decision in bankruptcy against R. Okawa, came up again on March 6th in the Yokohama District Court.

At the outset Mr. Nakamura, Plaintiff's Counsel, produced a statement which he said showed the amounts of money which the defendant had received from Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co. and which were referred to in the previous proceedings. Counsel also produced six cheques and stated that the payments were made by the plaintiffs with those cheques. The drafts bearing cross-lines, had been drawn through the Yokohama Jitsugyo Bank where he had a current account.

Defendant's Counsel refused to admit the documents as evidence in the present case, after which Mr. Awata, an expert in handwriting of Tokyo was summoned as an expert-witness. The Court ordered him to compare the signature and seal on the power-of-attorney given by the defendant to his Counsel, with those on the contracts given by the defendant to Messrs. Samuel Samuel and Co. The signature and seal of the foregoing contracts had been repudiated by the defendant's Counsel who insisted that the defendant was absent during the time when the various contracts were alleged to have been made between the parties. The Court ordered the expert to give his opinion in writing. The opinion of the expert was not disclosed during the proceedings.

Plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine the manager of the Jitsugyo Bank. Defendant's Counsel said that on Oct. 5th last the Japanese merchant made a contract with Messrs. Samuel, Samuel & Co., to sell iodoform to the latter and received forty-five hundred yen as bargain money from the British firm as the result of the contract. The Japanese failed to make delivery of the drug on the due day to the plaintiff. The Japanese however, never, made the various contracts alleged by the plaintiff's Counsel and consequently he had no direct responsibility for the cheques which were drawn through the Jitsugyo Bank. There was therefore no necessity to summon the manager of the Japanese bank. Defendant's Counsel added that his client closed his business in January this year and subsequently informed the Yokohama Tax Bureau, thus enabling himself to evade the business tax. No petition therefore was in order asking a decision in bankruptcy in accordance with the Commercial Code; the only course was insolvency under the Civil Code.

The Court decided not to examine the manager of the Japanese bank as requested by the plaintiff's Counsel, and ordered the defendant's Counsel to produce a certificate showing that his client had closed business in January this year. Thereupon the hearing was adjourned till March 15th though the plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court to resume it within a shorter time.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

The third trial of Mr. H. Kono and fifteen other politicians who are charged with having instigated the Tokyo disturbances was resumed on March 5th in the Tokyo District Court before Judge Imamura and Public Procurators Anju and Sugimoto.

Twelve letters were read by the Court clerk, after which Messrs. Kono and Ogawa gave brief explanations. Mr. Sakurai, one of the accused, delivered a long speech. He said that if the agitation of the public against the peace treaty at Portsmouth had reached the Throne, His Majesty the Emperor would not have given his sanction to the treaty. The accused further said that the assassination of one or two members of the Cabinet would not have caused any good result with regard to the public agitation. He never dreamed of such childish sport as setting fire to the official residence of the Minister for Home Affairs. S. Takata was examined as a witness, after which Mr. Kono and a few others were re-examined.

The Court decided to summon Mr. Mukada, Superintendent of the Koji-machi Police Office, and four witnesses. Mr. Imoto, one of the lawyers employed for the defence, asked the Court for leave to examine Mr. K. Yenjoji and others including Matsu, the wife of Yoshizawa, one of the accused, who was alleged at the first trial to be a spy employed by the Metropolitan Police Office. The Court gave its consent to the request and adjourned the case till March 9th.

THE RHINE DIVORCE CASE.

The hearing of an action between Mr. Charles F. Rhine and his wife Gretchen Marie Dorothea Rhine was resumed on March 7th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nagata.

Mr. Rhine was represented by Mr. H. Sato, and Mrs. Rhine by Mr. S. Sawada.

It may be remembered that Mr. Rhine lodged an action against his wife, now in Hamburg, petitioning for divorce, and the first hearing took place on April 21st last. Mrs. Rhine also filed a similar case against her husband and the hearing began on Sept. 27th last. Since then, the two cases have been postponed.

The actions were now brought up jointly for the convenience of the Court and the parties' counsel. The actions, however, were not amalgamated in accordance with the provisions of law. Mrs. Rhine's Counsel took the seat for plaintiff and Mr. Rhine's Counsel that for defendant, merely for the convenience of the Court.

As there has been an alteration in the organization of the Court Counsel repeated the statements they gave on April 21st and Sept. 27th respectively, after which Mrs. Rhine's Counsel said that Mr. Rhine had deserted his wife and child at Hamburg and since then had been residing in Japan. He lived with a Japanese woman named Matsumoto Haru who had given birth to two boys. The children are registered at the Yokohama City Office as illegitimate children. This conduct on the part of Mr. Rhine should be dealt with as adultery and must constitute a clear cause for divorce. After having been deserted by her husband, Mrs. Rhine entered employment in a family with the view of supporting herself and her only child.

Mr. Rhine's Counsel stated that one evening in Dec., 1892, when his client returned home—in Hamburg—from a visit to one of his relatives, he found that his wife and child were absent and that many articles of property had been taken away. He could find no trace of his wife and child. Her desertion must be taken as wilful, for in a letter which she left in her room addressed to her husband, she said: "I and my child have left you and will not return to you any more," and "you did not marry me for love's sake, but out of speculation, and my love for you has utterly ceased." Counsel further said that the allegation by Mrs. Rhine as to her employment in a family for the purpose of supporting herself and her child, was quite baseless. She has been living in the same house with a German gentleman named Wicker and was practically his wife, since she deserted Mr. Rhine. Any charge of adultery must be laid on Mrs. Rhine and not on Mr. Rhine. Counsel added that Mr. Rhine had obtained a permit and passport from the Hamburg Police Office when he left there for Yokohama. His departure was not made in secrecy as was charged by Mrs. Rhine's Counsel.

Counsel produced various letters as evidence and the hearing was adjourned till March 30th.

The monthly meeting of the "King's Daughter's" Circle was held at the Phoenix Hotel on Thursday morning, the 1st inst., at 10.30 o'clock, when the Leader reported that the Circle had sent sufficient money to the people at Hirose-mura to supply them with food for the coming two months. This village lies in a mountainous district about eighteen miles north of Sendai, where twenty poor families live. One new case, that of a poor paralyzed woman, who is living near Yokohama, has also been taken up by the Circle.

HONGKONG AND SHANGHAI BANKING CORPORATION.

The eighty-first ordinary half-yearly meeting of shareholders in the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation was held on February 24th in Hongkong; Mr. H. W. Slade presided.

The notice convening the meeting and the report having been read, the Chairman said:—Gentlemen,—The report which I have read on the half-year's working of the Bank is no exception to the favourable statements your directors have had the pleasure of laying before you for many years past, and I think there is no doubt it will meet with your approval. I hope that the proposed distribution of profits will also prove satisfactory to you. We recommend the addition of $10 lacs to silver reserve. In June last we increased the dividend from £1 10/- to £1 15/-, and I am glad to say that so far results have warranted that step. We are able to again propose a dividend of £1 15/- and also a bonus of £1 making a distribution of £4 10/- per share for the year. As regards the amount of the bonus, while circumstances have again been exceptionally favourable I feel that I must repeat the caution uttered by my predecessor in the chair to the effect that the £1 bonus should not be looked upon as a recurring certainty; more especially in view of the fact that we have since added 10/- a year to the ordinary dividend. It is only fitting that I should say at once that the thanks of shareholders are due to our managers, agents and staff generally, and I am sure you will approve of our action in voting them a bonus of 15 per cent. on their salaries. Turning to the balance sheet you will find that our note circulation shows an increase of $30 lacs compared with the figures on 30th June last, while silver current accounts are some $60 lacs less, reflecting the usual demand for money at the end of the year. The withdrawal of some of the local funds temporarily lodged with us in London, accounts for the decrease in gold current accounts. Deposits in gold remain practically unchanged, while silver deposits show an increase of $25 lacs. Outstandings under the heading of bills payable are $12 lacs less than six months ago. On the other side of the account you will see that we are in a very strong cash position. Coin lodged with the Hongkong Government against excess note issue has risen from $8,500,000 to $10,000,000, our cash shows an increase of $30 lacs, and we have about $11 lacs more bullion in hand and in transit. These increases are mainly accounted for by the expansion in our note issue already referred to, and by the preparations made for the usual requirements of trade at this period of the year. Indian Government Rupee paper, and Consols, Colonial and other securities, stand at $11,334,370.38 against $13,954,599.64 on June 30th. Sterling Reserve Fund investments remain unchanged. Current exchange is now over 2/-, the rate at which our gold reserve appears in the balance sheet, but any difference on that account is more than counter-balanced by the price at which the sterling investments stand in our books as compared with their market value. Bills re-comparable are lower by about $13,000,000 and there is a similar reduction in bills discounted, loans and credits. The dollar totals shown in the balance sheet, although higher than a year ago, are less than on June 30th; this, however, is accounted for to a large extent by the rise in the price of silver and the consequent higher level of exchange. The confident expectation that a revival of trade in the Far East would result immediately upon the conclusion of peace between Japan and Russia has not been altogether fulfilled, but though more slowly than was at first anticipated, yet surely the signs of renewed activity appear. With reference more particularly to the region directly affected by the war it is noteworthy that an agreement has been arrived at between Japan and China which, if interpreted in a wise and statesmanlike spirit, should eventually secure for all the great commercial nations interested that obvious benefit of the maintenance of the open door in Manchuria and equal trading opportunities for all, thus realising the aim which has been so steadily advocated from this chair for many years. We must not forget that it takes considerable time to move large bodies of troops, and this operation has involved the requisitioning of all available means of inland transport, preventing the free distribution of merchandise in the various markets in Manchuria. Notwithstanding those difficulties, however, a considerable business has been done and there seems every reason to expect that on the opening of the Northern ports and with transport available throughout the country, we shall see a greater demand for foreign manufactures and the opening of new and more extended markets in this large and important province. Gentlemen, the Bank continues to improve its position; we have made a good start for the present half year, and I think you may safely look forward with confidence to the future. If any shareholder wishes to put any questions I shall be pleased to answer them.

No questions being asked, the Chairman moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

Mr. Jupp—I have much pleasure in seconding the adoption of the report and statement of accounts. I feel I am only voicing the sentiments of all shareholders present in congratulating the Directors, the Chief Manager and staff on the splendid results they are again able to place before us. The bonus of 15 per cent. on their salaries voted to the staff, I am confident, meets with the very hearty approval of all shareholders (applause). As regards the dividend and bonus proposed to be distributed we have also good reason to be pleased to see a gradual increase of returns to shareholders. We are all relieved, I am sure, that the terrible war which raged for eighteen months in this part of the world is now a thing of the past and that a revival in trade is beginning to be apparent. The strong position attained by the Bank should, I think, be a source of congratulation and pride not only to its shareholders but to the whole Colony. The Colony and the Corporation have grown up together, so to speak, and each has contributed to the growth of the other. I cannot, I think, do better, therefore, than conclude these few remarks with the wish that they may long continue to thrive and flourish to their mutual benefit and advantage and to the good of us all.

The motion was carried.

THE NAGASAKI HOTEL LIMITED.

The second ordinary annual general meeting of the above Company was held on Feb. 27th at the Nagasaki Hotel, there being present Messrs. Ringer (Chairman), Wallace, Measor, Smart, Robertson, and Inman (Secretary).

The Chairman, says the Nagasaki Press, thus explained the position of the Company:—

The Company was registered in Hongkong on October 31st, 1905, with a capital of yen 120,000, and the shares have all been fully paid up. It was found necessary to renew a considerable portion of the linen and crockery and also to rebuild the servants' quarters at the rear of the main building. The cost of registering the new company was about yen 1,900, and has been included in the accounts now presented. It was originally estimated that yen 14,000 would pay for all alterations, but as the work progressed some defects were discovered in the water pipes and furnaces in the engine-room, which it was necessary to have attended to, with the result that the total expenses for improvements came to yen 21,000 and the odd yen 7,000 it is proposed to write off the profits of the past year. The value of wines taken over was estimated at yen 4,000, and with additions now stands in the books at yen 7,099.86. As regards future prospects the Directors have every confidence of at least doing as well as shown in the present report, and would recommend that half of any profit made in the future should be devoted towards establishing a reserve fund.

The accounts having been passed Mr. Wallace was re-elected Director, and the directors' remuneration was fixed at yen 750 per annum, while Mr. W. M. Wood was appointed auditor at a fee of yen 100 per audit.

SNOW STORM IN THE SOUTH.

Moji, March 6.

A severe gale was experienced here yesterday. Nine lighters with coal were wrecked in the strait. This morning a heavy snowfall took place. Six boats were wrecked on the Shimonoseki shore and one person was drowned.

Aomori, March 6.

A snow storm has visited this port. All the shops throughout the town had to be closed.

Dairen, March 5.

Owing to a heavy gale, the departure of all transports, except the Aki Maru, has been postponed.

Nagasaki March 6.

Last night snow was experienced here. It fell to a depth of two inches.

A small junk which was reported on March 6th to be missing from Yokohama harbour during the gale was found at Honmoku the following morning.

A lighter loaded with bricks capsized on the morning of March 6th off Shinagawa. The sendo on the junk were saved.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

At 11.17 a.m. on March 7th, a slight shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama, the duration being five minutes and seventeen seconds. Another slight shock was experienced about 6.20 o'clock in the evening.

The Crown Prince paid a visit on March 4th to the Zoological Station at Misaki near Hayama, belonging to the Imperial University, and took luncheon there. In the afternoon he watched the jibiki net fishing work near the village. At 3.30 p.m., he returned to the Detached Palace at Hayama.

The Royal Humane Society has made the following, amongst other, awards:—Bronze medal to E. W. Fillick, petty officer, torpedo depot vessel Hecla, for rescuing a man who fell overboard at Kagoshima, Japan, on October 24th; medal to Charles Hurcum, A.B., also of the Hecla, for his rescue of a comrade at Hongkong on November 10th.

The Nagasaki Press reports that the Nagasaki Whaling Company has ordered two whaling steamers from a Christiania shipbuilding yard, and they are expected to arrive in May next. The Company's steamer Hatsulaki Maru was despatched to the whaling base, Korea, on Tuesday. A great development of the whaling industry, says our contemporary, is expected in the near future.

The annual report on Kiaochow, covering the period between October, 1904, and October, 1905, which has been distributed in the Reichstag shows that the revenue of the Protectorate has increased 99 per cent., namely, from 501,946 marks to 1,001,170 marks as compared with the previous year. The shipping returns rose from 337 vessels, with an aggregate registered tonnage of 383,323 to 413 vessels, with a tonnage of 420,517. The receipts of the Chinese Maritime Customs increased from $618,000 to $796,000, while the value of the transit trade rose from $24,861,262 to $32,426,596.

A serious accident took place at 7.20 p.m. on Sunday, March 4th, on Daikanzaka, the steep road between Moto machi Nichome and the Bluff. While a betto named Kasasawa, of Messrs. Durand, Cobb and Co., was driving up an unoccupied carriage, a jinrikisha coolie, Miyasaki by name ran down with two children in his vehicle. The jinrikisha collided with the horse of the carriage, inflicting severe injuries to the animal. The further results were that the vehicle and carriage were more or less damaged, and the jinrikisha coolie and the two children sustained injuries. They were removed at once to the office of a doctor near by.

PRIMITIVE CULTURE IN JAPAN.

At a special meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan, held at 91, Bluff, Yokohama, on Thursday, March 8th, Dr. N. Gordon Munro read the following very interesting paper:—

Implements of stone for cutting, splitting, piercing, scraping and pounding still play a part in the arts of many so-called savages. Though the expression "stone age" is applied to this grade of culture, it is of ancient origin and probably came into being when such primitive ways of life were not far removed from the highest civilisation then extant. The myths which have grown up around the vestiges of this "stone age," testify to the incapacity of man to retain any definite knowledge of the unwritten past. It is only by comparison with the primitive conditions surviving in modern times that these relics have been properly interpreted as the working tools of a universal primitive culture.

The stone implements imbedded in the alluvium throughout Europe, and as it afterwards transpired, over the whole world, present much similarity in shape and finish. They are ground or chipped to definite forms with a degree of technique that could only be the result of long experience and expert knowledge. They indicate a comparatively advanced degree of human craftsmanship and it was natural that the uniformity of type should countenance the idea of uniform culture. The "stone age" thus acquired a significance which later investigation has not entirely dispelled. Within its limits all culture was primitive and the achievements of early man came to be regarded as the content of an epoch, rather than as a phase of evolution.

But there can no longer be any doubt that these relics signify the end and not the beginning of primitive culture. The recovery of rude implements from the gravels of the drift, proves that a phase more truly primitive prevailed on this planet long anterior to that of the finely chipped and polished stone. There is no need to recapitulate the evidence upon which is based the conception of vast antiquity for the human race. The general verdict of geologists and archaeologists is that most of these rudely shaped stones are the work of man, that they clearly prove his existence throughout the whole of the Quaternary era, that there are cogent reasons for the belief that he existed during the Pliocene, and perhaps the Miocene, periods of the Tertiary, and that his antiquity, therefore, must find expression in terms of geological change.

The discovery of ruder and earlier implements has upset the stability of the "stone age" by differentiating two unequal aspects of culture, an older and a younger, the paleolithic and the neolithic. Moreover a still earlier stage must be inferred, during which a being, which we may call man, conceived the idea of borrowing sticks and stones from his surroundings and of using the latter in their natural form as missiles and tools. The splits of disintegrated rocks, many of which are not unlike primitive paleoliths, could be used without modification for splitting, sawing, or boring wood, though not always very tough. A shingle beach too, furnishes many kinds of stone, the shapes of which, do, and probably did, suggest those of actual implements. Even in neolithic days unwhewn stone was often used for crushing and milling.

As pointed out by Mr. W. H. Holmes, the softer rocks in their passage down river beds, are triturated to sand or small gravel, while the harder are left in the lower reaches. A process of "natural selection" thus placed in the hands of primitive man the material most suited to his needs. It may seem but a short step or two from the utilisation of natural cobbles to the choice of sharp splits, and from thence to the intentional splitting of stones on the beach or river side. Such an advance however can only be reckoned along with a mental status of the lowest imaginable human order and probably occupied a considerable time. This initial stage may be termed "protolithic."

What has been called the stone age is divisible into several stages, of which three are distinguishable, viz., the neolithic, the paleolithic and the protolithic. These stages doubtless overlapped, so that in various places they were coeval. We cannot form even an approximate idea as to the time involved in these changes. A million years is probably within the mark. We do know that the content of the "stone age" is an "excelsior." From the standpoint whence the activities of the living are seen to be abruptly limited by the plane of the earth's crust and to be replaced by the relics of the dead, one may trace through the later geological record the sure signs of human progress. In the twilight of receding time we can discern the footprints of ascending humanity.

Rather than an "age" there has been a "phase" of human evolution. Whether or no man reached his present status by leaps as well as by steps is a question that awaits solution. We know at least that human culture has advanced by unequal gradations in response to the calls of the environment, now creeping on by a scarcely perceptible advance, occasionally sliding back under adverse conditions, again rushing on towards the higher life with impetuous speed.

Although the persistence of stone implements represents a salient feature only, of early culture, the durability and consequent survival of the same have given them, perhaps undue, prominence. Wood, skins, bone, clay, reeds, grass and other material have also had an intimate connection with the life of backward humanity. The use of stone, however, has adapted these other materials to his needs. The latter has perished in all but the most recent stage, where a few traces remain. Stone, and in later times pottery, are left as the skeletons of the primitive culture. The former long antedates the latter and is fortunately a witness that other ends were accomplished.

The word "primitive," which was formerly applied to the content of the "stone age," no longer conveys to the archaeologist the idea of a positive beginning. Like the expression "archaic," it is not infrequently used as a synonym for ancient or crude. It has been given to such relatively advanced grades of culture as the bronze and early iron (Hallstatt culture), though it always indicates a state far removed from the highest modern civilisation. It is proper, however, to limit it to the achievements of man in that culture which everywhere corresponds to the phase of stone, though in exceptional cases it is shared by users of, or even workers in, metal.

In this sense I have used the phrase "primitive culture in Japan" in order to distinguish it from the somewhat advanced culture of the Yamato race, which first made its appearance in Japan more than two thousand years ago.

Has there been a paleolithic culture in Japan? Stone implements of a rude type are found in large numbers, and in several European works attention has been drawn to this fact in language which permits the inference that they are paleolithic. But it need scarcely be said that mere want of finish does not constitute a paleolith. While a highly finished implement would occasion much speculation were it found in tertiary strata, a roughly formed one can be readily explained by its completion having been accidentally interfered with, or intention on the part of the maker to impart no more finish than was necessary for a special purpose. So far as I can ascertain, from the inspection of many sites and enquiries from experienced Japanese archaeologists, these implements are always found with neolithic remains. None have yet been found in glacial strata. They were probably intended for hoe cultivation, the splitting of wood or the scraping of skins, and there is no reason why such tools should be finely chipped, or polished. Even the simple splits and flakes found in these sites doubtless had their uses, indeed some of them shew, under the lens, distinct signs of wear, while natural stones, of rounded form, are always present, though their function as sling stones, for pounding clay or food, or for moulding and smoothing pottery, is sometimes a matter of conjecture. As a bundle of twigs does duty for the garden broom, while this appliance has undergone modification for the purpose of modern house cleaning, so these implements were roughly made to serve rough usage. They no more point to paleolithic culture than does the scraper of the Eskimo, or the milling stone, extant, some times in primitive form, in Europe at the present day. The deeper problem therefore, still awaits consideration.

During a vacation at Kodzu, I attempted to carry out an excavation of drift gravel in the valley of the Sakagawa, but was obliged to desist after two days' work, owing to a misunderstanding as to the depth to be removed. I obtained however, a few stones which rather strikingly recall the paleolithic type. One can be certain of their antiquity, but are they the work of man? I present them with some diffidence, in the belief that all evidence bearing on this important issue should be open to discussion. The task of deciding whether such stones are of human or natural manufacture, is one of great difficulty, and there are probably few specialists, even in Europe, who would pronounce an opinion on some of the specimens found in gravels. A study of the breccia of disintegrated rock has convinced me that one of the main points of distinction, namely the "bulb of percussion," is simulated in the residual stones of decomposed conglomerate, which have undergone fracture before cohesion. The shape, the denticulation of the edges and the almost microscopic evidences of use thereon, remain to guide a decision. But in the case of early paleolithic implements the form is so varied, or rather one should say that outside of one conical form in which the pointed end is usually prepared for splitting or stabbing, the paleoliths have no definite shape, being rough modifications of natural outlines. Nor do I see any reason why the denticulation of the edges should be regarded as a "sine qua non" of human manufacture, though it is a most useful guide to identification. We may take it that the earliest paleoliths were not trimmed at all; where flint was not available it may well be that the trimming of the edges was less carefully carried out. In Japan, flint is far from abundant and the human treatment of other hard stone is more liable to misinterpretation.

My excavation was too limited to ascertain the co-existence of extinct animal remains, but the bones of tertiary animals have been found in this country. These include the elephas primigenius, elephas namadicus, stegodon cliffi, stegodon insignis, ursus, ceruus, bison, rhinoceros, and equus. At this time Japan was continuous with the mainland of Asia and it is a suggestive fact that in Java, which also adjoined the continent, the upper Pliocene has disclosed the cranium of the Pithecanthropus erectus, the earliest type of a being than can be classed as human. It is therefore not improbable that paleolithic man dwelt on this land during the early quaternary. Even though these stones count for nothing as evidence, I feel sure that the vestiges of paleolithic culture are in the ground beneath us and will yield themselves up to future investigation.

Speaking of neolithic sites in Japan, the lecturer said at least four thousand such places were now known. He dwelt emphatically on the work of Professor Morse, who, he said, had literally dug the foundation of the subject. Dr. Munro displayed a map that he had prepared showing the number of sites for each province, and then entered upon some details with regard to the early Yamato culture in its relation to that of the primitive inhabitants. He continued:

THE PRIMITIVE LIFE.

The most urgent needs of man are food and the preservation of the body temperature. There are regions where neither makes a heavy demand on human energy, but as a rule they involve strenuous, if not continuous effort. The dominant ideas of food and shelter which to-day actuate the toiling millions of humanity are shared by the higher members of the animal kingdom and are deep-rooted in a remote and speechless past. Self protection and effort to maintain the bodily warmth by means of skins, alienated man from a vegetarian diet, by teaching him to take other life. Whether this change would have taken place without the use of fire is an open question. The teeth of man are not adapted to the tearing of raw flesh and it may be that fire preceded the general use of a food which could only by cooking be suited to the palate and digestion of a vegetable feeder. Protection for self and offspring was doubtless the motive of the communal life, with its resulting sociological phenomena, division of labour leading to commerce and followed by religion and the recreative arts.

The neolithic phase of culture in Japan, as vouched for by numerous remains, had attained to a high degree of provision, not only for immediate necessities, but also for the amenities of human existence. As a primitive culture, it was of an advanced type and probably little behind that of the iron culture which displaced it. The latter, by contact with the civilization of Asia, acquired some practical tips which it was not slow to turn to advantage, but I question whether in all-round culture it was the superior of that indigenous to Japan. In the following remarks, I shall try to give a sketch of the primitive life, based on the evidence which has accumulated within the past thirty years.

HABITATIONS.

There is some doubt as to the type of dwelling frequented by the primitive inhabitants. Beginning with what is known, I may remind you that in Saghalin and the Kurile Islands there are, or were recently, pit dwellings in actual use. The description given by Mr. Snow is so terse and graphic, that I shall quote it here. Though I cannot speak from personal knowledge, it corresponds with various archaeological findings and partial accounts so, it may be held to apply generally to this type of habitation: "The dwellings of these people were constructed by hollowing out a shallow pit, usually in sandy soil, planting posts around it, and, if they could be got, making an inside lining of boards. Poles were laid across the top, forming a flat roof, and more poles again laid at an angle from the edge of the roof, so as to give the sides a sharp slope. The whole was covered with reeds or grass, on which were placed earth and turf. The entrance was closed by a roughly made wooden door, which opened into a small lobby and low narrow passage, with another door opening into the main compartment. Around the sides of this, bunk-like recesses were constructed under the lean-to side walls. Sometimes these dwellings consisted of two or three rooms, each one being separated by a short, low, narrow passage with a door at each end. These larger houses are found more particularly on Shumishir, where the natives were much better off than those of the central Kuriles."

In Saghalin, such houses are called Tai-shisei, or Toiche. The latter word is used in the Kuriles. The former is probably the correct Ainu word and is given in Batchelor's Dictionary as "an earthen house." Tet being the Ainu word for earth, land, or clay, and chisel, a hut, an abode. An illustrated manuscript in my possession, written in the beginning of the last century, gives a picture of an "earth dwelling," much like that described by Mr. Snow, which was used by the "west Ainu." In the "Tokai Yawa," or "Evening Talks of East Yezo," in 1860, written by Dr. Ouchi Oan, who resided in Yezo for three years, as government physician, mention is made of the pits at Kusuri, which surround the table land on which the fortified place of Menkakushi was situated. Dr. Oan stated that these pits were supposed to be the dwellings of the "koshito" (small people), but adds "these koshito must have been a very ancient people, as the great grandfather of Menkakushi, knew nothing whatever about them." On digging in this place he found some unglazed pottery and an iron pot (with handles inside). In the "Kita Yezo Zuesetsu," by Mr. Mamiya Rinso (1855), it is said that the mode of building houses in Saghalin was the same as that of "the Ainu of Hokkaido," and the construction is given. A site was chosen on the hillside and excavated to a depth of three or four feet. Four posts were driven into the ground and the intervening spaces were filled in with the branches of trees, bark and grass. A ladder was used for entrance and exit.

In Saghalin these houses were occupied only from September or October till February or March, as sickness was said to follow prolonged residence. The former Eta likewise use their muro during these 5 or 6 months. In the Kuriles, Mr. Torii Ryuzo, who made a visit of inspection in 1899, also found the remains of pit dwellings, some of which had been in recent use. The pit dwelling was called "toiche" (earth dwelling), and the summer residence, "inunche," which is not quite appropriately given as "fishing house," the word "inun" being translated by Batchelor as "to stay away from home in pursuit of one's livelihood, as when fishing or working in a distant garden."

In Shumushu, Lieutenant Gunji found over 60 pits in one place, over many of which the huts still remained. These pits have been found in various islands of the Kurile group.

In Yezo, no pit dwellings now exist, but pits are plentiful. Captain Blakiston was probably the first European to note their presence on this island, though previously referred to by Japanese investigators. He published an account of them 33 years ago and was followed by Professor Milne, who made some suggestive remarks about them before this Society in 1882. According to the latter gentleman's observation, the soil excavated from the pit was banked up around it to form a low wall. Professor Kokanei has made the remark that the observations of Messrs Milne and Snow were wanting in detail, but I think that this verdict is scarcely appropriate. Neither gentleman is a professional archaeologist, but both have made valuable contributions to our knowledge of this primitive culture. It is not a difficult matter for those who follow in the footsteps of pioneers to add to the sum of knowledge or to avoid the pitfalls that beset the early investigator. Those however who have done original work in any subject will understand the practical impossibility of avoiding errors of omission and commission. Apart from other investigators the work done by these gentlemen alone, is quite sufficient to give a correct idea of the pit dwellings of Yezo and further north, and that work, be it remarked, was done over 25 years ago. With regard to the "inunche," Mr. Snow informs me that 30 years ago, the houses on Etorop were like those of the Yezo Ainu, above ground, as were those to the south of this island. North of Etorop, the houses were of the subterranean style, often excavated in a knoll and covered as described. Mr. Snow ascribes the persistence of this type of dwelling north of Etorop, to the dearth of large timber to which we may add the severity of climate. He noted the existence of pits on Etorop, Ketoi, Ekarna Alaid and Shimushir.

The pits found in Yezo, at Kusuri, Mororan, Abashiri, Otari, Sapporo, &c., are evidently the remains of similar habitations. Professor Tsuboi heard a tradition that they were formerly roofed in with the branches of trees. In area the largest are between 40 and 50 feet and the smaller about 20 feet. The shape is usually square, sometimes round, but occasionally crescentic. Professor Milne attributed variations in outline to the caving in of one side, but this explanation does not always hold good. Though the Ainu do not live in pit dwellings at the present day, their tradition about this kind of abode is widely known and has probably been taken too seriously. The name Koropok (un) guru, meaning, as Batchelor says, "persons dwelling below," and the Japanese word koshito, or kobito, also applied to the Ainu, meaning "small person," "dwarfs," are probably inference myths, like the European elf.

The occurrence of crude pottery, along with wares of wood and iron, in some of these sites furnishes a sound reason for the belief that they were formerly inhabited by the Ainu. I may state here also my conviction that the word muro, which is supposed to be of ancient Japanese source and which meant an earth dwelling, is of Ainu origin. Mu, in modern Ainu, means "to slant upwards or downwards," and Roro, Rorogeta, and Rorun or Rorui, refer to the inside of an Ainu hut, the former being "the head or eastern end of a fireplace; that part of the inside of a hut which lies between the east window and a fireplace" (Batchelor) with their slanting roofs rising from near the ground.

In modern times, the presence of pits in Honshu, was first demonstrated by Mr. Sato Demon. These are found mainly in Mutsu, so far as ascertained, and in considerable numbers in the district of Nishi-Tsugaru of that province. At Tokoshinai and Ohiru they reach an altitude of 1500 and 2000 feet respectively. At Tateishi there are also a good many. Pits have been discovered in various other parts of Japan, but most of these seem to be vestiges of another culture. The pottery in the latter is called Yayoi-shiki for no better reason than that it was first encountered at Yayoi street, in Tokyo. It was probably connected with the everyday life of the Yamato. These pits, according to Mr. Yagi, have a depth of two, or at most three feet, are found by dozens, sometimes by hundreds and extend from the south of Kyushu to Shinano and even sparsely as far as Mutsu. I have little doubt that they were used by the Yamato, perhaps by the inferior orders, as are pit dwellings by the poorer classes of Koreans at the present day, or by the Eta of Japan till recent years.

Even now they are occupied by members of the former Eta as workshops during the winter months. There are numerous references in ancient Japanese literature, to pits and pit dwellers. In the Kojiki and Nihongi, and in the old provincial records, there is evidence that pit houses were in use both by the native Tsuchigumo, or earth dwellers, later called Yezo, and the Yamato themselves. There are vague references also to caves, as well as instances where muro are intended, but I shall avoid reference to cave dwelling, which is nowhere clearly indicated, and which has no archaeological foundation in fact. I do not deny that there may have been isolated instances of such residence, but they are exceptions which may be dismissed from a general outline like the present. I shall only say that I do not know of a single authenticated instance of such residence. It may not be altogether in the nature of a digression if I mention some of the references to pit dwellings and it may economise our time should we take both pithouses and dwellers in historical routine. What may possibly be a faded memory of a pit dwelling, is given in the legend of the birth of "His Augustness Fireship," preserved in the Kojiki and Nihongi. In the former it is stated that his mother "built a hall, eight fathoms long, without doors, went inside the hall and plastered up the entrance with earth, etc." (Chamberlain). The Nihongi has "Muro" instead of "hall." The child is said to have been the ancestor of the Hayabito or Hayato, who have been identified with the Kumaso, who in turn may have been Yezo, a point which will be considered in connection with the primitive inhabitants. Again under the marvels of Jimmu Tenno's reign we read "On making his progress thence, a person with a tail came out of a well. The well shone." Is it a mythopoeic inference to suppose that a well which shone, might have been a subterranean dwelling? Once more we recall the "great cave" (Muro, according to the Nihongi) where the murder of the Tsuchigumo is said to have been perpetrated. As I have remarked, the reference to "stone mallets" is probably reminiscent of the primitive culture. During the reign of Sujin Tenno are passing references to the Yezo. We are told that Keiko Tenno "erected a temporary palace, muro, and dwelt therein," while the Tsuchigumo are again mentioned. Here also the "mallet weapons" appear on the scene. In the reign of Nintoku Tenno, an "ice muro" is described. The construction is worthy of notice, because it illustrates the preservation of a word by transference of its function. The Imperial Prince said:—"How is the ice stored? Moreover, for what is it used? He said:—"The ground is excavated to a depth of over ten feet. The top is then covered with a roof of thatch. A thick layer of reed grass is then spread, upon which the ice is laid. The months of summer have passed, and yet it has not melted. As to its use, when the hot months come, it is placed in water or sake, and thus used." (Aston's Nihongi). The modern Japanese use a device of this kind for preserving the heat of plants in order to hasten their growth and to encourage fermentation of rice in the manufacture of sake, the name muro being retained. Mr. Aston observes, "At the foot of Mount Ohoyama there was to be seen, some years ago, a large rectangular pit, three or four feet in depth, with a thatched roof sloping to the ground, and no walls, which was occupied as a dwelling by the pilgrims to that mountain." According to Brinkley the word muro is still used for "a room, especially a bedroom" (private room?). The roof of the Ainu hut, like those of most houses in Japan, is made first and then elevated to the desired height, a survival, possibly, of the time when the roof was, constructively, the house. It may be supposed that, like the habit in Saghalin, and elsewhere, the muro was used only during the cold weather, and that a more airy dwelling served the opulent among the primitive people and the Yamato during summer. We might also expect that this lighter house became tolerable during the winter, through the general use of charcoal. There are features of construction in Japanese as well as Ainu houses which favour the idea that an evolution has taken place, such as the compact roof, the comparative absence of walls, foundations, and inside passages, the single room model generally prevailing, the opening of the Genkwa directly into the living room, together with various survivals, now regarded as ornamental or ritualistic, seen in the Ise temples and to a modified degree in other temples and even residences. However this be, I take it that the survival of actual pit houses in the north, where alone the Yezo persist, is supplemented by historical and other evidence sufficiently strong to warrant us in the belief that the primitive inhabitants of Japan were accustomed to use this form of abode during the inclement seasons, when warmth and shelter were of vital importance.

MAINTENANCE.

Food, as a necessity more pressing than even shelter, might have claimed our attention first. The difficulty of treating this subject without some comprehension of the means by which it is obtained and prepared for human use, leads me to group the arts of life upon which maintenance depends, in one section. This will be devoted to the consideration of all implements and weapons, and all utensils and material, so far as known, which subserved the preservation of neolithic life in Japan. As consecutive order is of trivial importance, compared with the presentation of a consistent sketch of primitive life, I shall begin with the stone implements, diverging at times to note their supposed function, or to remark on their presumed association with other material or appliances. It will be observed that the use of stone lies more in the direction of preparing other material for human needs, than in ministering directly to them. For instance, the axe, chisel, hoe, scraper, arrowhead, spindle weight, and milling stone are all one or more steps removed from the end sought, such as dressing wood for house or furniture construction, preparing the soil for the crops, preparation and capture of skin and flesh, making thread and grinding roots or cereals. Generally speaking, its function was intermediary, but as means to an end, it was indispensable. As an end in itself, it played the part of a god, or an ornament for the person.

As may be supposed, many varieties of stone were used, the choice being partly determined by the locality, though small stones suitable for arrowheads, and probably these weapons themselves, were sometimes brought from a distance. The mineral from which larger specimens such as axes, are made, is usually, though not invariably, taken from the district in which they are found. Even the large stone pillars or clubs and milling stones have been conveyed, in the rough or finished state, for considerable distances. I have not attempted a chemical examination of material, but by comparison with known minerals, those that I have seen appear to consist of diorite, greywacke and other sandstone, fine granite, argillite, chert, flint, serpentine, obsidian, steatite, agate, quartz, rock crystal and even chalk. Cinnabar, and, according to Mr. Yagi, emery powder, were also employed.

It would be superfluous to discuss the various uses of mallets, axes, adzes and chisels. The mallet, of which this is the usual form (specimen) is of a somewhat advanced type and is plainly designed for a wooden haft. This other one appears to be a similar implement, or weapon, for we may surmise that they were intended for battle. It may possibly be that such weapons were retained for the rank and file of the Yamato, or that the mallet of the ancient traditions was confused with the sword through some weapon like this (specimen), which might have been utilised either for striking or cutting. The next specimen might have been hafted to form a formidable weapon, or it might have been of service for weighting the net used for catching fish. These stones are not uncommonly used for the latter purpose, but some are evidently of great antiquity, and I have occasionally seen them placed in small shrines, and on grave stones. This might suggest a phallic origin. Of less doubtful purpose are the 20 specimens which are here exhibited. You will notice that there is a general similarity in form, and that, like the neolithic axe of Europe, and nearly everywhere, the shape is conical, with the broad end adapted for cutting and the narrow one for handling or hafting. It is evident that this conical form tended to resist displacement from the grasp of the hand or haft, which might otherwise have resulted from percussion. The similarity of these objects with the stone axes of the world generally, is remarkable and indicates a prolonged evolution and perhaps transmigration. The smaller specimens are sometimes made of the comparatively soft mineral steatite and the markings on them hint at leather cutting or dressing. Those that are ground on both sides are included in the term axe, while I have applied the name adze to those that are finished to a flat edge, ground on one side, of which this is a specimen. This is a sample of the stone used for grinding these implements.

Here one method of isolating the piece to be formed into an axe or adze, is well illustrated; the groove resulting from erosion on both sides is clearly seen. When this groove was sufficiently deep, the piece was detached by percussion, a primitive labour saving device. When the edge of an axe was dulled, it was again ground to a point, and even when broken it could be thus repaired. We see therefore these specimens which have diminished in size and in which sometimes the edge is brought to an instance of economy. The edge varies in contour; sometimes it is flat, sometimes curved, sometimes it forms less than a right angle with the blade. Thus we see the passing into the chisel and knife forms in these specimens—small objects of similar shape, made of jasper or other mineral are occasionally, though rarely, seen with a hole drilled through for suspension. These may be regarded as a kind of primitive pocket knife. This specimen is well preserved, and the hole is interesting, for it illustrates the primitive plan of boring with a conical drill, or piece of bone and wood aided by friction with sand. The resulting hole is therefore conical, and when excavated from both sides, is narrower in the centre than at either aperture. Talking about chisels and knives reminds me of Sir John Lubbock's remark on the difficulty of positively assigning uses to them. Who, he asked, could enumerate the uses to which a modern pocket knife could be applied? How can we hope to know all the functions of these implements? Just as a chisel may be used as a knife, these tools probably served for either or more purposes. The small chisels here shown were probably like the perforated axe, personal companions, and the knife saws of which here are several kinds were certainly so, the knob for the string to which they were attached to the clothing is a reliable witness.

Here are some roughly chipped implements of which one cannot aver their function. Some are doubtless scrapers, if we can judge by analogy with other cultures, past and present. They were employed for scraping skins to remove the superfluous fat and connective tissue. Others might have been chisels or wedges for splitting wood or bone. Those of this shape are described as spoons, but it may be questioned whether wood was not a more likely material, if spoons were in use as they are by the present Ainu. They may have been utilised as scrapers, for opening shells, digging roots, or many other purposes which we cannot now fathom. One might suppose that some of these stones were employed for the production of music. Sounding stones were used in China 3000 years ago. By tying some of these stones over a piece of bamboo I have obtained a primitive form of piano, but it would be little short of rhapsody to submit that a primitive Liszt performed on a similar instrument in Japan. The Chinese xylophone is made of bamboo. We can scarcely regard it as the descendant of one made of stone because the most primitive one known is made of wood. It is just possible that the hyoshigi, or wooden clappers of the Japanese, were originally made of stone, but this suggestion is made with reserve.

The fiddle-shaped stones, of which many shapes and sizes are here shown, are a puzzle to archaeologists. In lack of finish, they resemble paleolithic implements. At a first glance, one might suppose that they were fishing weights, attached by their narrow waist to the net. An examination of this waist, where it is usually much worn, satisfies us that it was attached to something. When we examine many of these stones it becomes evident that they are not by any means ideal fishing weights. There is too much surface in proportion to body and some of them are so thin that they would hardly serve this purpose at all. The fiddle shape, moreover, is not constant, but passes by degrees into other forms. One end is usually brought to a thinner edge than the other, the stone is always split, though frequently dressed mainly on one side and often bears signs of wear on the edge. These considerations induce the belief that this implement was designed for cutting, hacking or scraping and that it was secured to some kind of shaft by a cord or tendril.

It might have been adjusted to the shaft like this, with its surface parallel to the axis of the handle, or like this, at a right angle to the shaft. In the former position, it might have served as a rough axe for cutting or chipping; in the latter, as an adze for chipping or hacking, or as a hoe for scratching the ground. It may seem but an imperfect appliance for preparing the soil, but within the last century or two, a wooden hoe more primitive than this was used in Sweden. I believe this to be a hoe, for the following reasons:—

1. It is improbable that it was adjusted as an axe, because most of these stones are trimmed more on one side than the other, a finish which is obviously inconsistent with the design of an axe.

2. The waist is worn in a manner that is not quite compatible with longitudinal, and highly suggestive of transverse fixation to the shaft. This might be accomplished by adapting it to a forked stick.

If used as an adze, such a stone would likely have had more weight and would probably have been more symmetrical than those before us. In many cases the edge is not suited to chipping wood and would scarcely have preserved its rounded form if used for this purpose. The cleavage lines, too, indicate a tendency to split when a vertical blow is delivered against wood or resisting material like it, and this tendency would be increased by the rough finish.

Though one cannot be certain that they were not used as adzes, yet the balance of probability seems to be much in favour of the view that I have put forward, namely that they are the implements of a primitive agriculture. Mr. Numata states that implements of stone are used for hoe cultivation by the natives of Formosa. Mr. Yagi, however, tells me that this is doubtful, but that they were used as wedges in splitting wood by their ancestors. One cannot understand how such an form could have been employed for splitting wood. The Records of the Sui (Japanese Zui) Dynasty, dating about the beginning of the 7th century, state that implements of stone were used for agriculture by the inhabitants of the Luchus. There is, however, no positive evidence that agriculture was carried out by the primitive inhabitants. No millet, barley, buckwheat nor rice has been found in the sites, but vegetable matter of any kind is so excessively rare that this negative evidence counts for little. Unless some kind of primitive agriculture were carried out, it would be difficult to account for the almost invariable selection, in the Kwanto, of sites that are thickly covered with black soil. In this region, it may fairly be said that of two locations that seem equally desirable, that one will be found to contain remains that has the greater depth of black soil. A situation seemingly more favourable will be lacking in relics should it not have a good covering of earth. On the former sites, too, it will be noticed that the finds of pottery, &c., are grouped around certain centres so it is not improper to suppose that these centres were residential areas separated by plots of possibly cultivated ground. When we consider the advanced degree of artizanry exhibited by this culture and the evidence of arts incompatible with the merely hunting stage of existence, the conclusion will be almost irresistible that hoe cultivation was included in the repertoire of its life cycle. When dislocation of the culture occurred through pressure exerted by the Yamato, when a sedentary life became impracticable and a hunter's existence was all that was left to these people, the art of agriculture would naturally decline but might have lasted in some measure till the exodus to Yezo. There, if I am rightly informed, the fiddle-shaped implement is unknown.

The implements and devices for hunting and fishing were many and various. Spear heads are not common, but are sometimes of excellent workmanship. This specimen of obsidian, which is 18 centimetres long, is a beautiful example of the flaking art. Here also is a head of chipped flint and one of slate rubbed down to a point. Arrowheads are of many kinds of mineral and varieties of finish. Flint, chert and obsidian are the favourite stones, but agate, jasper and other minerals were used. Those of agate were usually of small size, too small, one would imagine, for practical use. They may have been used as a medium of exchange, a form of primitive money. From the specimens shown here you will see that the forms are various, but nearly quite the same varieties of shape are found all over the world. This resemblance conveys a suggestion of primitive intercommunication from very remote times. Some of those arrowheads resemble the awls for boring wood or soft stone and it is impossible to say to which class such a specimen as this belongs. In his "Japanese Anthropology," Mr. Yagi states that the head of a harpoon has been found in the skull of a fish in a shell mound at Shizuka, in the province of Hiachi. Various other implements for fishing and the chase, made of bone and deer horn have been exhumed from these sites, e.g. harpoon holder, nozzle of floating bag, fishing hooks, arrow nocks, bow tips and arrowheads. I have succeeded in finding but few of these relics, but through the kindness of various collectors, I am able to show you these specimens. . . . The origin of the poisoned arrow used by the Ainu, is obscure, but this habit is not likely to have been acquired from a northern race, and we may suppose that it came with them, or was copied from some southern tribe. It is not impossible that it was known to the neolithic people. If we may judge from similar cultures elsewhere, traps and other devices for capturing various sorts of game, were known, and fishing nets were certainly used. Here on this pottery, are rude illustrations of nets and these cylinders of clay and various stones were probably utilised for giving weight to the lower margins. For floating the upper margins, wood, or bamboo, or floating bladders, which this nozzle seems to have been connected to, may have served the purpose.

The Ainu have a tradition that the Koro-pok-guru used boats hollowed out of logs and others consisting of a framework of wood, covered with grass. The boat used by the Ainu of Yezo, or that described by Mr. Snow in his account of the Kurile Ainu, does not seem to have been evolved from such a design, or from one of skin, like the kayak of the Eskimo. It is safe to affirm that boats were included in the primitive armamentarium, for fishing and locomotion; the presence of neolithic remains on Oki, Oshima and Sado, prove that they were large enough to traverse fifty miles or more, of open sea.

Whether any kind of armour was used by the Yezo in their struggles with the Yamato, one cannot say, but the Ainu have a tradition to the effect that their ancestors used stone armour. Nothing of this nature has been identified, but it is possible that certain plates of pottery from the sites were sewn into the garments over vital parts.

From what I have stated, it is unquestionable that the primitive people hunted the bear, the deer, the bear, and other animals with bow and arrow, and fished in the deeper waters of the sea, and in the rivers. Besides gathering shellfish and seaweed, roots, fungi and fruit, they may have indulged to some extent in hoe cultivation. Was the inao of the Ainu, like the Japanese Inari, a cereal god? Batchelor tells us that the Ainu divide millet into two classes, male and female, which taken together, are called the divine husband and wife cereal, so "say the ancients. Therefore before millet is pounded and made into cakes for general eating, the old men have a few made for themselves, first to worship." Mr. Batchelor remarks: "Such communion as this is of the very essence of religion, and will appear again more clearly when we come to discuss the subject of 'bear worship.'" The marriage of plants and of the corn god is of great antiquity in Europe and Asia and it is scarcely likely that the Ainu invented it, though it is barely possible that they derived the notion from the Yamato. Mr. Yagi, who at my suggestion, kindly made some enquiries, has ascertained that the New Year decoration of rural districts, consisting of five sticks attached to bamboo and even now in some places known like the inao, represent the varieties of millet whittled as awa and hir. This is probably also a survival of primitive cereal worship. Though we cannot conclude therefrom that this custom arose with the primitive inhabitants, its survival among the Ainu lends support to the view that cereal cultivation was known to the primitive inhabitants.

The primitive pottery is never turned on the wheel, is always under the quality of hardness known as stoneware, and is often imperfectly baked. The unconsumed carbon is left as a dark streak in the body of the paste, as you notice when I break this fragment. Sometimes it is left as a dark patch on the exterior, or interior of the vessel, as in these specimens. You will observe that the pottery is of a reddish, sometimes greyish colour. Its comparative softness may be judged by the dull sound produced by striking one of these vessels. The section exhibits a coarse texture, because the clay has been tempered with rough sand and occasionally particles of quartz or small pebbles. Though colouring of the exterior, or interior, was not frequently employed, the patterns composing the decoration are of great variety and sometimes beauty. It lacks the regularity of form and equality of substance attainable only by the potter's wheel, but this is more than compensated for by the greater freedom of composition. The fictile art of the primitive culture ranges into such variety of form and decorative motive that volumes might be written on the subject. It differs greatly from that of the Yamato culture. The Yamato pottery is nearly always turned on the wheel, is usually very hard resembling stoneware, is uniformly baked throughout the paste and has a subdued decoration of limited pattern. This consists commonly of wave lines, parallel, oblique or vertical lines, or circles and incised triangles, as in the specimens before you. With the exception of the latter two, and perhaps of the wave lines, there is difficulty in tracing the meaning of the decoration. In the primitive pottery, the decoration, though usually conventional, is less removed from nature and is replete with fantastic shapes derived from animate or inanimate forms. Both wares bear the patterns of archaic textile fabrics. But in the case of the Yamato pottery, as in the specimens seen here, these fabrics are imitated in most instances. On the other hand, the textile fabrics of the stone phase were almost invariably applied directly to the clay, so that a genuine impression is left in reverse. In the one case we have a conventional survival, in the other a primitive actuality.

This is a cooking pot. Several shapes were used, varying between pot and pan. This elongated vessel was evidently intended to rest between the burning logs and in the ashes of the primitive hearth. That this vessel has been exposed to fire is evident from the burnt condition of the bottom. You see that it is highly ornate both in form and decoration. We later beings, who are accustomed to have our food cooked out of sight, in utensils that are not things of transcendent beauty, find it difficult to realise that artistic taste should descend to the kitchen. Our unaided imagination would place this elegant vessel among the flower vases, or perhaps ceremonial dishes. But when we reflect that food was in all probability cooked before the assembled household and guests, who watched its transformation with longing eyes; when we consider that the cooking pot was a soup (urech) and perhaps the whole dinner service, we cease to wonder at the appetising garbishing of these vessels. The motive, which is sometimes that of the marrowbone, more or less idealised, may seem somewhat odd; but after all, it is no more bizarre than the decoration of our game, or fruit dishes, or the name which used to adorn a gastronomic club in Yokohama.

Cooking pans with handles inside for suspension over the fire, instead of insertion in the embers, have existed, at least in Yezo and the Kuriles. These have been put forward as proving a culture differing from that which we are discussing. I may remark however, that the Yezo, or Ainu, have long been accustomed to purchase iron pots from the Japanese when they had the means to do so. Some of these had handles inside. Pots of cherry (ge bak) suspended by sticks which served the same purpose are still in use. Until a few years ago, the art of pottery making survived in a decadent and languishing form among the Kurile Ainu, and it is no matter for surprise if this useful design has been copied in clay. While dissenting from the inference that this design implies a difference of race, we may accept it as a proof that contact with the Japanese culture has had a modifying effect on that of the primitive remnant, now called the Ainu. I may point out, however, that many of the cooking pots in other parts of Japan are provided with perforations that could have been utilised for suspension, so that the distinction is not really fundamental.

Here are various bowls, passing into plate or saucerlike forms. Cups are not very common: the bamboo probably supplied the need. Some of these specimens may have been small jars. The drinking pot is curious and deserves a little attention. It is shaped, as you see, like a teapot and is probably the ancestor of this and the kettle. Some one has, I think, suggested that these forms were lamps, but none exhibit any sign of such usage. For drinking or libation, the Yamato used a vase with a wooden or bamboo spout inserted in a hole reserved for that purpose, as in this specimen. Both these vessels contain the same idea of sucking liquid refreshment that begins with infancy and ends in the absorption of a "gin sling" through a straw. One name given by the Ainu to the intoxicating beverage sake is tonoko. Batchelor translates tonoko as "official milk." It would be interesting if the Japanese word tono, "a lord, or chief, could be shown to be derived from the Ainu tono a chief, or official. It would carry the suggestion that districts occupied by the primitive population had been ruled by Yamato officials, since these retained the Ainu cognomen. With great respect, however, for Mr. Batchelor's opinion I would ask whether it is not possible that the word tonoko was derived from to, a nipple, or breast, and not a mouthful; I put this query, because an affirmative answer would correspond to the shape and decoration of many of these drinking pots, a few of which however may be of phallic design. Unless the word to is used for milk, tonoko would scarcely carry the meaning of "sake," when combined with the Ainu word tono, an official. Even then it would not be very appropriate unless taken in the sense suggested by our drinking pot. If the Ainu derived the word tono from their Japanese masters, the derivation of tonoko from tono and to becomes less plausible. Bottles, large and small, for water or other fluids, and jars for solids or liquids played their part in the domestic outfit of the primitive people.

What we may call a vase (specimen) was probably a vessel for food. Some of these are of advanced forms, placed on modern looking pedestals. They may have been influenced by the shapes of the Yamato pottery, or even by that of China, for these are usually found in the north, where the primitive culture lingered long enough to see the dawn of Chinese civilisation in Japan. Lamps were in use, not of a mean description either, if some of the specimens described as such, filled this role. I present you with a good instance of economy in the primitive household. This broken bottom of a vase has been acting as a lamp. One can see that the fire has burnt the clay where the wick laid against it. Here is another illustration of economy. A broken vase has been repaired by drilling holes on either side of the crack or fracture, through which cord or creeper was passed to bind them together. Whether this has been a brazier is not positively certain. Charcoal was used and it is not unlikely that vessels of this kind were in vogue. What are described in other countries as incense burners are also found. This specimen is highly ornamental, with a suggestion of anthropomorphism. One is not certain that they had not some other office.

Strangest of all the relics of the stone phase in Japan are the clay figures of human and animal forms. I have brought a few for your inspection. You will observe that none of these twenty figures corresponds to our idea of a natural human form. To our thinking, they are all more or less grotesque, but this word does not describe the impression which they produced on the art critics of the primitive culture. When we regard them closely, we notice in each an intention to reproduce one or two features so distinctly that they could not fail to attract attention. These features are exaggerated for the purpose of identification, a well known device in primitive and not unknown in modern art. These figures are in fact caricatures in which true proportion is always subservient to the dominant expression of one or more salient features. Those who have even casually studied delineative art, know how difficult it is to realise on paper or canvas a balanced picture of any human being. Even with special training it is almost impossible to produce a likeness that is not to some slight extent a caricature. I take it that these specimens of the ficile art were regarded as eminently satisfactory portraits in their day and if they raise a smile now, it is because they differ from our own conventional ideals and not because they were intended to play the part of clowns.

Time does not permit me to enter into all the interesting details presented by these figures and the conclusions to be drawn therefrom. I will trespass however for a moment on your attention while I point out a few of their special traits and the hints they convey regarding the primitive inhabitants of Japan, (description).

From the foregoing we gather:

a.—That these figures were intended to represent definite personalities.

b.—That ancestral worship was the incentive of their origin.

c.—That they show us various styles of costume, hair arrangement and other details of personal adornment during the primitive culture.

d.—That they give us some idea of other customs, such as mask dancing, conventional posing, and festival garnishing.

e.—That they supply data which may help to decide the question of racial origin.

Figures of several animals, including the dog, bear, and ape have been found in the sites. It is not known whether they were playthings or whether they are relics of the totemism which claims affinity with the lower animals, but probably the latter.

I have referred to certain plaques of pottery that are supposed to have been used as quoits, or in some game corresponding. I have suggested that these might have been sewn into the garments in order to give protection against the iron arrows of the Yamato, but this is a mere speculation. Some of these plaques are distinctly anthropomorphic, as these illustrations show. It is quite likely that they were divinities in themselves and that the representation of detached features, such as eyes, is a conventional rendering of human attributes. The beginning and the end of deity making.

These specimens were fishing weights, such as are used to this day. The modern ones are usually harder and sometimes slightly glazed. The smaller ones may have been intended for decoration of the person. These two pieces of broken pottery are notched on the sides for retention of the string by which they were attached to the net.

Next to the human images, the decoration of the primitive vessels is of most importance in enabling us to distinguish those slight differences of culture that obtain between peoples of the same sociological status. Portraiture is the ancestor of decoration. To the unaccustomed eye, the patterns on the primitive pottery may seem a bewildering array of curved and straight lines. Even the expert cannot always trace their significance, but enough has been elucidated to prove that they are survivals of decoration which was intended to depict definite objects. These, the primitive artist sought to transfer from his surroundings to some article of wood, bone, or clay. We need not enquire whether this picture was intended as a mark of, or to enhance the pleasure of, possession; or whether owner's marks did not anticipate portraiture and enter by adoption into later designs. What is certain is that the combination of parallel lines, angles, triangles, circles and other figures seen in the patterns of archaic and savage handiwork, are not the result of a subconscious striving after geometrical designs. They are delineations which have gone astray. This aberration might result from several causes, singly, or in combination. Among these we may note: (a.) Difference in the capacity of the original copyists from nature. This is seen in the work of all artists. In the absence of special training it exercises a profound influence on the result. (b.) Conditions under which the object is seen, as varying perspective and shadow. (c.) Gradual departure by successive copying from one picture to another. Mr. Balfour has shown, in an interesting and amusing series of pictures, how confusion may result. (d.) When conventionality obtains, the background is apt to be selected as the principal motive. In the patterns known as mutsudomoe and fatutsudomoe the comma shaped design is supposed to be of Yamato, or Korean origin. The Ainu, however, who employ this pattern, regard the intervening space as the motive and the other as the background. In these specimens, you will see that the peculiar pattern which the Ainu claim as their own, is actually found as a detached decoration on their knife sheaths and moustache lifters. Technical restrictions due to material naturally exercise great influence on the motive; thus we see a difference in the same design when transferred to wood, bone, basketry, tapestry and mosaic. This effect extends in a less degree to the most plastic of primitive materials, i.e. clay. (f.) The necessity of adapting the design to the shape and contour (curved, flat, or circular surface) of the vessel on which it is worked, is a frequent source of conventional patterns. Passing on from the consideration of these objects with which he dealt at great length, Dr. Munro spoke next of the diet of the primitive inhabitants, remarking that he had found no sign of the custom of cannibalism and illustrating his statements by reference to the implements exhibited. He next took up objects designed for the decoration of the person, and finally spoke of the people to whom these belonged, expressing himself as of opinion that they were ancestors of the modern Ainu.

THE PRIMITIVE PEOPLE.

The people of this country, both men and women, tie up their hair in the form of a mallet and tattoo their bodies. They are of fierce temper and their general name is Yemishi. Moreover their land is wide and fertile. We should attack them and take it. This land was the Kwanto. In later times tattooing seems to have been used as a method of branding. In the Nihongi, one Hamako is said to have been treated in this fashion for having assisted in a rebellion.

Jewelry was worn by the primitive people. Tama, a ball bead, jewel, is an Ainu as well as Japanese word, but from whence it took its origin I do not know. These stones and shells are samples of what were worn as primitive jewelry. In some cases these beads resembled the magatama of the Yamato, they are also said to have been shaped like the tamassae of the Ainu. Before leaving the subject of personal decoration I would like to mention the peculiar configuration of the eyes seen on some of the clay figures. They are rimmed as if by spectacles. Professor Tsuboi takes this to be an eye guard, derived from the snow protectors used by Eskimo. I venture to suppose that these eye ridges are merely a conventional way of presenting the eye, or at most a representation of face painting, seen in the masks and figures. Their interpretation as eye blinds was believed to support the derivation of the primitive people from an Eskimo, or similar stock, but when we view the grotesque conventionality of these images, this feature appears to be a caricature, rather than the survival of a northern practice.

A word remains to be said about the race, which left these primitive remains. This need occupy us but a little time, for the simple reason that definite information is not forthcoming. This lack of knowledge has given rise to two theories as to the ethnic position of the primitive inhabitants. One view is that they were mainly, if not entirely, of the same race as the present Ainu, the other, that they were related to the Eskimo in type and culture. Taking into consideration the evidence that has been brought forward on both sides we cannot resist the conclusion that the former view is the more rational. The notion of the Koro-pok-guru, a people alien to the Ainu, has its origin in a tradition of the latter regarding the dwellers in pits extant in Yezo and the north of Honshu. Beyond the name, these people have vanished, leaving not one distinguishing feature behind them. The pit dwellings, the muro, are no longer inhabited by the Ainu of Yezo, but still by those of Saghalien and, until recent years, by the Kurile Ainu. The name muro, I take to be of Ainu origin. Though the word toi-chisei, house of earth, is now in use for the winter, as distinguished from the summer dwelling, it may have outlived the former owing to the fact that the habit of hunting necessitated the erection of lighter residences during the warm weather. These were formerly erected in the forests and mountains valleys, while the houses of earth were easy safe from Japanese raids. Thus the terms inun-chisei and toi-chisei would be used to differentiate the two kinds of dwellings. If the latter were destroyed and rebuilt every year like those of the Eia, it would facilitate the substitution of one name for the other. As time passed and the habit of earth dwelling lapsed, the name and fact alike would easily be forgotten and an inference myth would arise among a totally illiterate people. Hence the Koropok-guru.

When we come to ask what osteometrical evidence is there in favour of a race distinguished from the Ainu, the reply is that there is none. Professor Koganei has made a comparison, based upon a few long bones found in the shellheaps, but he admits that nothing conclusive can be founded on them. They seem to indicate that the long bones, notably the tibia, approximate more to the Ainu than to the Japanese, which is equivalent to saying that they are both more primitive. These bones, which I have obtained from my excavations, closely resemble those of Ainu. The indexes of these tibia are 57.1 and 69.6 respectively. Not one skull has yet been placed on record. I have learned that two nearly complete skulls have been removed from the sites, one from underneath a bed of lava on Oshima and the other from a shellheap. About the age of the former there can be no doubt and with either, there can be difficulty in deciding whether they belong to the Eskimo type which, with its combined dolichocephaly, huge malar bones and round orbits, is most easy to recognise. The probability, however, is that the primitive dead were not generally buried in the sites and that an organised search would likely yield enough material on which to base a decisive conclusion.

If direct ethnological evidence is wanting, we need scarcely go afield to consider the arguments founded upon similarity of culture to the Eskimo, such as the existence of snow blinds, absence of pottery, &c. Even if some resemblance were to be found, and so far the evidence does not justify it, it would not be incompatible with a difference of race. Nor should we place much weight on the difference to be found between the culture of the present Ainu and the past Yezo. The Kuile Ainu have been potters of a limited kind, for the reason probably that they could not get enough of the iron ware of the Japanese to serve all their purposes. They made earthen pans with handles inside, because they served the same purpose as the iron pans which were similarly provided. I have studied the Ainu patterns a little, and compared them with those on the pottery of the stone phase. Though far from being an expert in such matters, I feel bound to say that I can see little or no difference beyond what might be caused by change of life habits and material on which the patterns are wrought. It must be remembered that we have no relics of the wood utensils and implements of the primitive folk, though they must have existed, and it is probable that they had their own appropriate patterns. As Dr. Koganei has pointed out, too, a great interval of time has passed between the stone phase and the present day; twelve hundred years have elapsed since the border of Yezo was about the 38th. degree of north latitude; how much longer since they were driven from the Kwantō it is difficult to say, but two thousand years is a fair estimate. Much can happen in that time, much has happened in England both with language and culture. Driven from their villages and forced back by the Yamato to the roving life of the hunter, we cannot wonder that the primitive inhabitants neglected the amenities of their previous culture. Apart from this, it would seem that the influence of contact with an iron culture is not always beneficial to primitive people. Dr. Moritz Hoernes quotes an observer of the conditions prevailing in the South Sea Islands: "The iron of the Europeans followed too closely upon the stone of the savage, and the necessary consequence was that the latter fell ill and pined away morally and physically, as an effect of that which should have been a blessing."

Mr. Batchelor, who introduced the Koropok-guru to us, has recently, as the result of a scholarly investigation, come to the conclusion that all the place names in Yezo are of Ainu origin. Professor Chamberlain, many years ago, called attention to the survival of Ainu names in various parts of Japan. With the aid of Batchelor's new dictionary I have investigated about a hundred names of villages where shell mounds and other sites of the stone phase are known to exist. I have little time for such work, but by doing a few names daily I hope to get, by and by sufficient evidence to prove their Ainu origin. I am taking the names without selection as they come on the list. So far, I have been able to trace between sixty and seventy per cent. to Ainu roots. It is rather surprising to hear that such familiar words as Yokohama, Tobe, Onori, Oso, may be Ainu words, as Yedo is also said to be, but I have little doubt that is the case. These roots may be a common heritage of the Japanese and Ainu from a continental stock, nay, they almost certainly are so in their monosyllabic elements. The construction of words in both these languages by agglutination, somewhat lessens the ability to discriminate between them. But when we find the names of villages in the vicinity of primitive sites composed for the most part of Ainu roots descriptive of the locality, as are the present Ainu names of places at the present day, we may well ask whether these remains were not left by the ancestors of the modern Ainu. This is my opinion, which is shared by Mr. Batchelor, though I do not subscribe to his dictum that the pottery of the Hokkaido is sundried only, not burnt. The pottery is all baked, though imperfectly so. I think that we may say goodbye to the Koropok-guru. They have vanished like the "unsubstantial fabric of a vision" and left not a bone to tell the tale.

CUSTOMS PROTEST.

Mr. K. Hashimoto, Director of the Yokohama Customs, delivered a decision on March 7th with regard to a protest by Messrs. Carl Rohde and Co. No. 70, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama. According to the text of the decision, the firm imported a "hand-roller" with certificate of origin on which the appraisers imposed 20 per cent. ad val. duty in accordance with No. 497 of the tariff and 10 per cent. as extraordinary special tax. The importers contended that the implement should be dealt with under No. 17 of the tariff. The protest was dismissed on the ground that the article in dispute could not be included in the list of machinery and parts of machinery which are classified in No. 17, and that it is merely an article made of metal.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CASE OF H. B. COLLINS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Shortly after hostilities broke out between Russia and Japan, a British subject, named H. B. Collins, was arrested, tried and convicted of the very grave offence of imparting military information to the enemy.

This man is still confined in prison and has many weary years of penal servitude before him.

In consideration of the fact that the whole affair originated owing to the state of war prevailing at the time when the offense was committed, I wish to suggest that now peace is restored between the two nations, it would be a gracious act to release this prisoner, who is charged with a purely military offense.

The war is a matter of history and a thing of the past, the whole quarrel is finished, the sword has been returned to its scabbard, the enemies have shaken hands and become friends, and it is surely advisable that all traces of the sores and scars of the terrible struggle should be healed and effaced. Under these circumstances, it is now unnecessary to retain in prison foreigners who were either directly or indirectly mixed up in military operations.

Several years ago, Mrs. E. M. H. Carew was sentenced by the then existing British Court to suffer the extreme penalty of the law, but in view of the Imperial Proclamation of H.M., the Emperor, dated the 31st of January, 1897, granting to all Japanese subjects under sentence on that day a remission of punishment, Sir Ernest Satow, the then British Minister, exercising his powers, commuted the sentence in gracious consideration of the Imperial Proclamation. There was nothing whatsoever making it incumbent upon Sir Ernest Satow to commute the sentence, but he did so as a measure of grace in consideration of a certain event in the Imperial Family, and in view of the Imperial Proclamation above referred to.

The present is a time of rejoicing in Japan, inasmuch as a British Prince has only lately arrived in this Empire, charged with a special and happy mission by his Sovereign, and I am convinced that if his Imperial Japanese Majesty's Advisers could see their way to suggest an imperial pardon for the prisoner, H. B. Collins, this clemency would not only be greatly appreciated by British subjects generally, but would form an appropriate return for Sir Ernest Satow's graceful act of 1897.

I desire it to be clearly understood that it is not my intention either to defend the acts of the accused, or to dispute the justice of the sentence itself, but merely to suggest that mercy be extended to an unhappy British subject, imprisoned, by the irony of fate, in a land, the illustrious Ruler of which is at present the host of a Royal Prince of the country to whom the prisoner owes allegiance.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,

AN ENGLISHMAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In reply to the appeal of "An Englishman" with regard to the case of H. B. Collins, which appeared in the Japan Mail of the 6th inst., I should like to say a few words. At the time when H. M. the Emperor gave his sanction to the Portsmouth Treaty, some Japanese journalists, it is said, paid a visit to the Public Procurator's office of a District Court and asked whether H. B. Collins would be released by an Imperial pardon as the result of the restoration of peace. The opinion of the judicial officials was that he had been punished in accordance with the Penal Code though his offence was of a special nature, and that there were no circumstances extenuating his offence so as to bring it within the scope of an Imperial pardon such as that extended to Captain Bougouin. There is a rumour that the Emperor will proclaim a pardon to all political offenders and other special convicts in May, this year, on the occasion of the grand festival to be held at the Shokonsha Shrine, Kudan, Tokyo, in honour of officers and men who died in the late war. Probably H. B. Collins may share in the Imperial benevolence.

I would point out that if Collins is pardoned then some foreigners who committed a similar crime at Yingkow and a number of Hungtuts, who attempted to carry out raids at Newchwang when in the pay of General Mischenko, should also be released from detention at Dairen. I am as earnestly desirous as "An Englishman" must be that the Imperial sympathy should be shown to these poor people, for, as he remarks, "the war is a matter of history."

I am, Sir, yours faithfully.

A JAPANESE.

THE FAMINE IN FUKUSHIMA.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—You were kind enough some weeks ago to publish a letter of mine and an appeal for the sufferers in Fukushima-ken Famine District. Since that letter and appeal appeared many kind friends have further contributed, some most liberally, to my Fund. I have no fresh news to tell, because we see the same sad state of poverty and want no matter how far we go inland, much more so among the hill people. There are cases where more than rice is needed, though it is out of the question to think the many thousands of starving people can be visited by those who are doing all they can to help and comfort the cold and hungry. Here is a case by no means the only one. An old woman aged 74 blind and deaf. The poor old woman looked as if she wanted a little attention. She had lain there four years on straw without a bit of a futon. The straw was on the bare earth. The only covering she had was a lot of filthy old rags. At her feet was a shed, the door being an old rice bag hung to keep out wind and snow. Money given out by the Guncho or Soncho generally fails to help such sad cases. She has now two good futons for which she is most grateful. Besides donations to my Fund some friends have kindly sent bundles of old clothing which all come in useful and will help to make some poor cold creature feel warm. Nearly 100 new warm wool shirts have been given away to poor children. Every week some 300 hot meals are being given to poor children and often a little rice to take home. We have begun relief work in two other villages and I hope to begin soon in two others.

I shall be grateful if you will kindly publish a complete list of donations and contributions to my Fund.

THE TRADE OF KOBE.

The annual meeting of the Hiogo and Osaka Chamber of Commerce should have been held in Kobe on Wednesday afternoon, but the attendance was so meagre that Mr. A. Woolley, the Chairman, adjourned it till a future day. The following extracts from the Committee's report should prove of interest:—

Customs Statistics for the year show the trade of Kobe to have reached the record total of yen 313,072,684, the figures for the last six years being as follows:—

	Imports. Yen.	Exports. Yen.	Total. Yen.
1900.....	137,484,281	69,706,549	207,190,830
1901.....	125,979,022	77,206,226	203,185,248
1902.....	144,516,111	74,748,143	219,264,254

In Imports, in which there is an increase of yen 52,758,804, almost all lines show an increase on the previous year, the more important being:—Raw Cotton, yen 26,835,369; Woollen Cloth, yen 3,421,722; Oil Cake, yen 2,809,739, and Metal and Metal Goods generally, in which is included an increase of yen 7,355,621 in Machinery. The only really marked decline was in:—Rice, yen 10,890,809; Blankets, yen 2,713,139, and Kerosene Oil, yen 3,513,768.

The falling off in Exports to the extent of yen 3,517,499 was spread over practically the whole trade, very few of the more important staples showing an increase.

SHIPPING STATISTICS.

Entries of shipping at Kobe for the year 1905 were 4,131,152 tons as compared with 3,384,574 tons of the previous year.

The following list shows the position of the different countries whose tonnage exceeded 100,000 tons during the twelve months under review:—

	1905. Tons.	1904. Tons.	1903. Tons.
Great Britain .....	1,807,701	1,677,423	1,454,843

OSAKA.

The trade of this port continues to increase steadily as the returns for the last six years indicate:—

	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
1900 .....	9,741,437	9,626,595	19,368,032
1901 .....	10,246,750	12,646,293	22,893,043
1902 .....	11,875,730	15,050,519	26,926,249

1905 .....	18,499,831	55,938,208	74,438,039

The principal import was Brown Sugar of the value of yen 6,777,367. In Exports, there was a striking advance, chiefly in Copper (including Copper Discs for Coins), Cotton Yarn, Cotton Piece Goods and Sake. The bulk of the trade of the port is with North China and Korea.

The Tonnage of ships entered for the year was 399,426 tons against 165,333 tons for 1904.

In reply to this, Sir E. Sir E. Grey explained that there was no foundation whatever for the report which caused this idea.

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.

The market has been excited this week and plenty of business has been done, at high prices. Sellers decline to give refusals and are confident of a further advance. Spring reeling of filatures are now coming on the market and meet a ready sale. Re-reels are very scarce and the business done is at extreme rates. One second-hand parcel of Five Girl crop is reported sold at yen 1,050 but there is no stock of good Joshiu Re-reels in first hands.

HABUTAYE AT YOKOHAMA.

Enquiries from America and Europe have been made throughout the week. No special business, however, has been done owing to the high level of prices in connexion with the recent troubles in Fukui and other places. The present aspect of business is generally believed to be likely to continue throughout the week.

A telegram from Kawamata says that on March 7th, thirty-five hundred pieces of silk were sent to Yokohama. Prices are generally speaking stationary.

DOMESTIC BUSINESS.

RICE.

During the week, the rice market was active although fluctuating. The Osaka market was especially brisk and by this the Tokyo and Kobe markets were affected. This state of things will probably be kept up during the forthcoming week.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

Severe falls were experienced during the past week but on Friday the general condition was stationary.

As to the Railway Nationalization Bill no definite view has to be remarked. The general belief is that the bill will pass the Diet in spite of the serious opposition by nearly all the newspapers, etc., to the government proposal.

EXCHANGE.

THE RAILWAY NATIONALIZATION BILL.

The Special Committee to which the Government bill regarding the nationalization of private railways was referred, met for the first time at 10 50 a.m. on March 9th. Mr. Haseba presided. Marquis Saionji (Premier), General Terauchi (Minister for War), Mr. Sakatani (Minister for Finance), Mr. Yamagata (Minister for Communications), and other members of the Cabinet and Government delegates were present. Mr. Oishi Masami, the well-known Progressist, put a series of questions which he itemized under eight heads.

Marquis Saionji, in reply, said that the principle of making all railways state-owned had been in the mind of successive Governments since the construction of the first line in Japan. It was the first business of those in office at the present time to encourage the development of various industries and so to strengthen the bases of the national finances. To this end, it was believed, the improvement of railways ought to be the first step to be taken. The Government hoped to achieve further improvement of means of transportation so as to make them fit to deal with the requirements of commerce and industry as well as to meet the dictates of military necessity.

General Terauchi, Minister for War, added to the remarks of the Premier that during the Japan-China war and the Russo-Japanese war, considerable inconvenience was experienced with regard to the various private railways. The measures necessary for national defence had to be classified under two heads: offensive and defensive. Japan had not in the foregoing wars experienced the necessity to act on a defensive movement—only on the offensive. If, unfortunately, defensive measures required to be adopted, the inconveniences connected with private railways must be accentuated.

Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, spoke at some length, pointing out that the State purchase of private railways would not endanger the basis of national finance. The loan to be raised for the carrying out of the project is to be redeemed within forty years, and it was not intended that it should be repaid by the imposition of new taxes but instead by the profits on the railways. A portion of the profits earned was to be appropriated towards a fund for the improvement of the railways so that no anxiety need be entertained by subscribers to the loan. Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Communications, said that as a result of the railways becoming State property the freight and passage traffic would be at a lower rate than was now the case. He further explained that the Government did not intend to provide a special department for railway affairs, but would appoint a directing official in place of the present director of the Railway Bureau. Mr. M. Kato, a member of the Special Committee, asked a question, to which Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Communications, replied that in the first place the Government had no idea as to whether the present railways were to be altered to broad gauge; (2) uniformity of administration could not be enforced unless the lines were nationalized; (3) the nature and extent of railway improvements during the next forty years had not yet been definitely arranged; and (4) the Government authorities would give close attention to repairs, etc., on private railways until their purchase within five years.

Mr. Yamauchi, Director of the Railway

Bureau, also gave a brief explanation, after which the Committee rose at 12.20 p.m.

The session was resumed at 1.20 p.m. Mr. Kato introduced further questions to which Mr. Nakakoji, Vice-Minister for Communications, and other Government delegates gave replies. At 3 p.m., the session closed.

On March 10th, the committee met at 10.50 a.m. Questioned by Mr. Y. Asano, a member of the Committee, Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce, said expenses will be economized by bringing all railways under one control. Naturally freight and passenger rates would be reduced so as to encourage the development of industry and commerce.

Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Communications, gave an explanation as to improvements on railways, estimate of profits, etc. After a question had been put by Mr. M. Kanaoka, Marquis Saionji made a brief speech in which he said that the step taken by the Government to nationalize the railways was their first object among post bellum undertakings. At noon the meeting closed.

The Committee met again at 10.30 a.m. on March 13th. General Terauchi, and other Ministers and Government delegates were present. Mr. S. Hayami, one of the committee submitted questions in connexion with financial administrations in the event of private railways being nationalized. The questions were not answered by the Government delegates, Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, being absent. Mr. Oto, of the Daido Club, presented questions as to (1) the reasons for securing the uniformity of railways; (2) the reasons for nationalizing the railways for national defence; (3) the capacity of transportation, the economizing of expenses, the lowering of freight and fares, etc., after the railways come under Government control; (4) foreign examples with regard to the benefits of nationalized railways; and (5) the opposition of Mr. K. Takahashi, Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, and the leading business men of Tokyo. Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Communications said that with regard to the reasons for securing the uniformity of the railways and the interests concerned, the Premier, and he had given explanations at previous meetings. For the rest, other Government delegates would give explanations. In connexion with the special privileges given to the Nippon Railway Company, Mr. K. Muramatsu, one of the Committee, commented on Art. 9 of the bill—to the effect that the Government will assess the value of private railways after investigation by commissioners, and their valuation will be taken as final. Mr. Nakakoji, Vice-Minister for Communications, replied that the alleged privileges given to the Nippon Railway Co. were made in 1881. The Government's promise was regarded as imperfect in law; consequently there would be no inconvenience involved in the abolition or amendment of the contract. The valuation to be made by the examiners would be a convenient method of transferring private property to the State. The Minister for Finance having now arrived Mr. Hayami repeated his questions and Mr. Kubo supported him. Mr. Sakatani said that the Government intended to purchase the railways by issuing loan bonds during seven years as had already been explained. Therefore there need be no anxiety as to any fall in the price of bonds. Suppose that the sale of loan bonds took place on the public market and the sellers intended to buy railway shares before the lines were nationalized, the price of shares must go up and there would be little profit for the purchasers, who would abandon their intention to exchange the bonds in their possession for railway shares. This was in the very nature of national finance. Mr. T. Nishimura addressed questions as to the fluctuation of bonds in the public market, to which the Minister for Finance briefly replied. At noon, the meeting closed.

At 10.45 a.m. on March 13th, the committee resumed its session. At the outset of the discussion, Mr. Takatomi said that in regard to several questions already submitted, the Government delegates had not given the necessary explanations and it appeared that they merely intended to hoodwink the committee by giving vague answers. He dwelt upon several questions. For one, the Government's plan was to purchase over thirty railways within five years. In what order were they to be acquired?

Mr. Nakakoji, Vice-Minister for Communications, replied that it had not yet been settled which was to be the first railway purchased.

Mr. Taketomi.—Asked what was the Government's idea in arranging for five years since there was not yet any decision as to the order of purchasing them.

Mr. Nakakoji.—As the Minister for Finance has explained, the Government authorities have temporarily fixed five years in accordance with financial convenience.

Mr. Taketomi.—Will the Government abandon the intention to purchase the railways if there is any financial inconvenience?

Mr. Nakakoji.—Please put off the question with reference to financial affairs, till the Minister concerned is present.

Mr. Taketomi.—During the late war, many locomotives and carriages were hired by the military authorities and sent to Manchuria. As the result of their onerous employment, many of them were damaged. The Kyushu and Sanyo Railway Companies are now repairing damaged locomotives and carriages by raising loans abroad. The Government will also be responsible for such repairs when these railways are purchased. What amount will the Government need for that purpose?

Mr. Yamanouchi, Director of the Railway Bureau.—The bill provides an article for that purpose. The expenses necessary for repairs are to be defrayed from the income of the railways nationalized.

Being further questioned by Messrs. Taketomi, Okada and Noda, Mr. Nakakoji said that the Government would of course make the utmost efforts to increase railway business by adopting the best systems devised by official and private companies. Mr. Hirai, Director of the Railway Industry Bureau, said that on account of the nature of construction and the location of some railways, the running expenses on different lines would vary considerably. The Shin-yetsu, Chuo and O-u Railways cost more in running expenses than other railways. General Terauchi, Minister for War, said that with regard to the bringing of the railways under Government control, adequate reasons were given at the time when Mr. M. Oishi submitted his lengthy question. He added that suppose an enemy landed on the Kii peninsula (Wakayama prefecture), a force needed to destroy him must be concentrated on the frontier. For transporting such an army, all the railways would exclusively be needed as the combined systems could alone supply the needed number of carriages. Any one of the private railways would be unable to meet such an emergency or be able to keep up the necessary reserve of carriages. At the present moment the transportation of two or three hundred thousand soldiers at one time was entirely impossible. In the Japan-China war much difficulty was experienced. Consequently at the outbreak of the Japan-Russia war, the Government invested several million yen in trying to avoid the inconvenience previously experienced in the transportation of the armies. Yet many difficulties were encountered and the authorities were finally induced to bring forward their proposal that all the railways should be placed under state control. Mr. Yamano-uchi, Director of the Railway Bureau, also spoke, after which the Committee rose adjourning the discussion till the following day, March 14th.

The committee which is discussing the Railway Nationalization Bill met again on March 14th. The questions put were almost similar to those propounded at the previous proceedings, and the Government delegates duly replied to them. Mr. Haseba, chairman of the committee, declared that the discussion had now been completed but that the Bill providing for the purchase of the Seoul-Fusan Railway must be taken up. Mr. Muramatsu, one of the Committee, asked whether the Government could purchase under this bill a railway which was constructed under a charter given by the sovereign of Korea? Mr. Nakakoji, one of the Government delegates, replied that the railway had been constructed in a foreign country but that the company which built it had been organized in accordance with Japanese law. Owing to that fact there was no difference between the Seoul-Fusan railway and a railway in Japan. At 2.15 p.m. the Committee rose.

In connexion with the Railway Nationalization Bill, the members of the Lower House belonging to the Daido Club, held a conference on March 14th and decided to unanimously support the Government's proposal.

TOKYO TRAM FARES.

What are known in Tokyo as "The Three Inner Circuit Electric Tramway Companies" have decided to ask permission to raise the uniform rate for passengers from 3 sen to 5 sen per person. This with the one sen traffic tax added would mean a uniform rate of 6 sen per person for rides varying from 300 yards to 5 or 6 miles. The Fiji Shimpō discusses the subject in a lengthy article published on Saturday last. It first states the alleged reasons for the proposed alteration in the rates charged. The Companies say that the present rates do not enable them to form an adequate reserve fund, nor do they leave any margin for necessary repairs. If the Companies are bent on having a substantial reserve fund, they certainly, with the present rates, can not pay the shareholders a fair dividend. With a uniform 5 sen rate they could pay a dividend of about 10 per cent., and accumulate a suitable reserve fund at the same time. On this representation of the case the Fiji comments as follows:—The uniform 3 sen rate was fixed by the Companies themselves quite voluntarily. Whether it is a high rate or a low rate we do not pretend to know and most of the citizens who use the cars are as ignorant as we are on this point. At all events it is a fact that the Directors have hitherto represented to the shareholders that the present charge is quite adequate and have actually distributed dividends ranging from about 8 to 13 per cent., per annum, and even now are paying over 10 per cent. This story about the inadequacy of their profits is circulated for the first time to-day. One would suppose that a number of business men would be able to make a pretty correct estimate of the amount of traffic on the lines and of the sum of money that would annually be realized. According to their own statements the Companies have been paying higher dividends than they were warranted in doing on strictly business principles. To neglect to form a good reserve fund is a sure way of ruining the whole electric car business. One way of getting out of the mess into which they have run things is that as an atonement for the deception the companies have practised on the public, or for their ignorance, certain office-holders on the Directorate should resign, and it is alleged that already certain resignations have been sent in. But for only one or two to go out of office does not meet the case at all. The Directors should certainly resign in a body and hand over the affairs of the Companies to clearer-headed and more careful administrators. The new Directors should set themselves to examine impartially the affairs of the companies with a view to deciding whether the state of the Companies' accounts actually render the proposed higher rate a necessity. This and this alone would tend to allay the uneasiness now prevailing and restore confidence in the soundness of the business principles of the three Companies concerned. As matters now stand, the confidence of the public has been rudely shaken. We have little doubt, continues the Fiji, that were the accounts of the Companies closely scrutinized many irregularities would be found. There are unquestionably too many weak points in their organization. To us it seems that the present is a suitable time for an amalgamation of the three concerns. It would save much expense and would be a great convenience to the public to be able to travel anywhere over the lines of the inner circuit with the same ticket. If after the Companies have been united thoroughly reliable auditors and other business men are of opinion that the present rate is too low, then let it be raised by all means, but the sudden and unsatisfactory way in which the change has been proposed has naturally created the suspicion that the public is not being fairly dealt with in this matter.

THE CHURCH IN FRANCE.

An address, which is invested with peculiar interest at the present time, was delivered at the Royal Institution in London in the end of January by Mr. J. E. C. Bodley, whose History of France is the standard work for English students. He began by pointing out the extreme prejudice which French law showed against all unauthorised associations, a heritage from the individualistic traditions of the Revolution. Nevertheless, at the close of the nineteenth century religious Orders, though existing only on sufferance, were more numerous and powerful than at the end of the ancient régime. The ordinary clergy had no special sympathy with these Regulars, and would have welcomed any honest measures to limit their excessive growth. The power of the French Church had lain in its administrative ability, and it was admirably fitted to work in harmony with the State. After analysing the provisions of the Separation Law, Mr. Bodley described three attitudes towards it discernible in France. The moderate Republicans thought it an act of repression, aimed at that religious liberty which was fully guarded by the Concordat; the Government held that the relations with the Vatican had become intolerable, and had better be ended before things became worse; while the philosophical Radicals considered the Concordat a scheme of privilege for Rome, which was impossible under a régime of liberty. On administrative grounds Mr. Bodley regretted the change, as the first important breach in the great Napoleonic edifice of reconstruction. "The Concordat was a work of stupendous genius, and the Separation Law was the work of ordinary mortal men."

SIR THOMAS JACKSON.

The bronze statue of Sir Thomas Jackson was unveiled with appropriate ceremonial in Hongkong on February 24th by the Governor, Sir Matthew Nathan. The usual complimentary speeches were made on the occasion, Sir Matthew in particular being very felicitous. He said:—

In the three months that I spent in England in 1904 between my return from the Gold Coast and my departure for Hongkong, I had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of three men whose powers of mind, strength of character, and attractiveness of personality far transcended those which fall to the common lot. And I recognised in these three men the type that had maintained, during the last quarter of the nineteenth century, the greatness of the British Empire outside the metropolitan country. The first of the three was Sir George Dashwood Taubman Goldie, who, while guiding the affairs of the Royal Niger Company, had secured the mouths of the Niger for Great Britain. The second was Sir Frank Swettenham, who, in a long connection with the Malay States, raised them to their present prosperous condition. The third was the man who, for 26 years, steered the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank through difficulties and dangers to opulence and security, who tempered wise caution with equally wise boldness; British earnestness with Irish joyfulness, and necessary strictness with genuine kindness. It is his whose features—done in bronze—by Mr. Raggio we shall now see before us, and shall admire with the esteem and respect Sir Thomas Jackson so well deserves.

Sir Thomas Jackson, remarks the Hongkong Daily Press, in the course of some musings, is one of those men whose memory does not need a monument to keep it alive. In his case the words Si Monumentum, circumspice are most aptly applicable. As Sir Henry Blake said in 1899, when Mr. Thomas Jackson was receiving the letters patent of knighthood, "Who does not know T. J.? I believe, ladies and gentlemen, that if letters were dropped in the post in St. Petersburg, Berlin, Paris, London, Frisco, Santa Fe, and the little post office of the Straits of Magellan addressed 'T. J., China,' they would find their way into the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank in Queen's Road." In more serious vein, the Governor of that day referred to "the tongue of good report, that crystallised estimate of a man who has been for many years in a prominent position before the public, and whose acts and thoughts and feelings have become facts in the general welfare." The keynotes of that "good report" were honesty and ability. Sir Thomas Jackson's ability was apparent to all, and his superlative honesty was an article of faith with all who had dealings of any kind with him. We get the impression, indeed, that he is not merely an honest man—"the noblest work of God"—but that his fellow-men look up to him as a kind of commercial saint. His unflagging energy went beyond banking, beyond money-making; he did "good work for the general interest of the empire," and so set an example that might well be taken by some other Irishmen of these degenerate days. His ingenious character was displayed in the manner with which he accepted the honour of knighthood. He named the colleagues whom he considered to have done ungrudging "sterling service to the Empire," Messrs. Cameron and Hillier. He was happy in his remark that he looked upon the Hongkong Bank as his "Number one wife," and the laughter and applause did not obscure the recognition that he had for many years been a very devoted husband indeed. It is worth remembering that he then had "the greatest opinion of the future of Hongkong," and we may be pardoned the little superstitious touch of suggesting that the presence of the mere effigy of such a man in Hongkong should be regarded as "good joss."

THE NANCHANG MURDERS.

Saturday, March 10.

Shanghai papers contain very little more news concerning the murders at Nanchang than has already been published in Japan. The North China Daily News prints extracts from a translation of the official report by Viceroy Chou Fu at Nanking, which was sent to the Waiwupu:

"On the 29th day of the first moon in the town of Nanchang itself, the Catholic missionary Lacruche, had invited the sub-prefect Chiang to a dinner, without ceremony, to discuss the religious matters of Taupou and an affair between Catholics and Protestants which had occurred at Yukiang.

"On both sides there was discussion about these subjects. A knife and a pair of scissors were taken and it was said that the death of the sub-prefect would at once settle the matter. The sub-prefect then took up the small knife on the table to commit suicide, but the pain prevented him from completely killing himself. He states that some one then enlarged the wound with two cuts with scissors, and these latter wounds are very serious. The sub-prefect is not able to speak or tell more at present, but when he regained consciousness he himself wrote these details."

The story sounds very unconvincing. With regard to the Rev. H. C. Kingham, who with his wife and one child, was murdered at Nanchang, we learn from the Shanghai Mercury that he came out to China in 1894 and had been in charge in the Nanchang-fu district for six or seven years. His wife was the sister of another missionary working in the same province in the mission station called Sin-chang-hsian. Nanchang-fu is one of the four largest cities in China and is supposed to have a population of a million people. The Methodist Episcopal mission is strongly represented there, having altogether eight missionaries. The officials have always been very friendly to missionaries in the district. Mr. Kingham's married sister—Mrs. Hopkins—along with her husband, are on their way out from home to assist in the work at Nanchang-fu, they having left home on the 20th February per the German Mail steamer Prince Eitel Friedrich.

Under date of February 27, a correspondent at Kiukiang wired to the Shanghai Mercury:

From the refugees who arrived here this afternoon I have been able to obtain full details of the riot. It appears that on Sunday morning Nanchang was placarded with posters calling a meeting of the gentry, scholars and people to consult on the alleged outrageous action of the Roman Catholic priests. Thousands attended and the excitement was intense. When the riot began the priest accused of wounding the magistrate was the special object of a brutal attack.

The Rev. H. C. Kingham earlier in the day had been repeatedly warned by the officials to leave, but as the quarrel was only with Roman Catholics he declined.

Everything belonging to the Roman Catholics was destroyed, and immense damage has been done. Three hundred orphan girls have been scattered.

The property of the Methodist Episcopal Mission and the China Inland Mission is untouched. Mr. E. T. C. Werner, the British Consul, is taking vigorous action.

Other telegrams printed in our contemporary read:—

Kiukiang, 28th February, 2.25 p.m.

The Rev. A. P. Quirnbach, of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, who has remained in Nanchang, telegraphs that there is a panic in Nanchang and that thousands of people are leaving fearing the arrival of foreign gunboats.

Gracie Kingham was buried to-day.

Nanchang, 28th February.

The number of the Catholic priests who were killed is six in all. One of them was the head of the French School and the rest namely Liang, Hsu, Kin, Lu, and Meng are all Marist Brothers. Governor Hu has issued a proclamation to punish under martial law any one who commits riotous actions.

Writing from Kiukiang, the Mercury's correspondent says:—"The immediate cause of this terrible uprising is said to be a dispute about land between the Catholics and the officials. The Hsien magistrate on Thursday evening went to supper with some of the priests to talk this matter over again. Angry words were spoken and the Hsien is said to have taken one of the knives from the table and cut his own throat. Next morning the story was all over the city that the R. C. priests had tried to murder the Magistrate! The Governor put out a proclamation saying that things were not clear and he would make an enquiry on the morrow. No news has reached us as to what transpired at that enquiry, but the following day the riot, attended with such awful results to so many, took place. The Kinghams seem to have suffered solely through their proximity to the Catholic Mission."

Mr. Spencer Lewis writing to the N. C. Daily News says:—"We hear that the Kinghams were urged to leave two or three times before they attempted to do so. They were beaten to death, stripped, and the body of Mrs. Kingham thrown into a pond. Mr. Kingham lived for a few hours afterwards, and the older child till the next day. The younger child was saved by a soldier, who caught her, and covering her with his clothing took her to the house of the amah. The soldiers came to Miss Warr, and surrounding her, took her to their camp. The crowd were throwing stones into the China Inland place, but word being sent, the soldiers came on the run, and the two families were also taken to the camp."

Tuesday, March 13.

The mystery surrounding the Nanchang magistrate's interview with the French Fathers on the 22nd February is still involved in the densest cloud of contradictory stories. The clearest account of the tragedy appears in the N. C. Daily News, from the pen of an American missionary, who was a close observer on the spot from February 22nd to February 26th. He says:—

"Evidence is to hand to show that Wang, a French priest, invited the Nanchang Magistrate to supper on Thursday, the 22nd of February, to discuss the Sinchang troubles of last year, which the Magistrate, Chiang, took a prominent part in adjusting. Several culprits were still at large and the demand was made for these men or a large sum of money; and six Catholics, implicated in a murder case some years ago, must also be released. The Magistrate pleaded that he must get the consent of his superiors; he dared not take so much upon himself alone. He was pressed to sign an agreement; he refused, saying: 'Even if I did, I could not carry it out.' The priest, enraged, said that if he, Chiang, died the case would be easily settled. It seems Chiang tried to get away, but was detained in the guest hall, where it appears, a knife was put in his hand, with which he cut himself slightly—a horizontal cut, not deep. Almost immediately he was struck by a weapon in the hands, the magistrate thinks, of a coarse person, not the priest himself. The weapon was probably a pair of shears, inflicting a deep wound and cutting the oesophagus, so that swallowed food oozed out of the aperture. He fell, and was left lying there. His attendants had all been compelled to remain outside, as private business was to be discussed. Priest Wang hurried immediately to the Governor's yamen, and tried to bring a charge against the magistrate of suicide with intent to involve the Catholic Mission.

"During the priest's absence, the magistrate's underlings came in and found their superior lying in a pool of blood. Being unable to speak, he made signs, and a tablet was brought upon which he wrote asking for his brother to come immediately, also that no disturbance should be made, and naming Wang as the guilty party. His family, the prefect, and others soon arrived, and there was a notable scene. The Governor dispatched two hundred troops to surround and protect the premises, and prevent the escape of anyone. Before long the Provincial Judge arrived, and Wang and the magistrate were confronted, the magistrate pointing to Wang as the responsible person. Early next morning the wounded man was carried to his yamen. To have engaged a foreign doctor would have impaired his dignity, but he lingered on in a moribund condition.

There seems little doubt that had the Governor, H. E. Hu, taken strong action at the outset the riot could have been avoided for the meeting which preceded the massacre did not come together till 10 o'clock on the following Sunday morning. Our Shanghai contemporary points out that "Nanchang has for years had the reputation of being a turbulent, anti-foreign place. It was at Nanchang that the late Mr. Baber had an adventure which threatened to be fatal, but for his coolness, promptitude, and courage, which turned the hostility of the populace into admiration. Of late years, the Protestant missionaries have been carrying on work there with much success, but there have been constant troubles in Kiangsi between the Roman Catholics and the Chinese, as there must continue to be until the Roman Catholic missionaries abandon their assumption of official rank, which the Protestant Missions had the good sense to decline from the first."

Some attempt was certainly made to control the mob on the fatal morning, but the number of troops engaged was altogether insufficient, while it is also evident that had Mr. Kingham and his devoted wife heeded the warnings sent them by the officials they might have escaped their doom. The story of their death is very sad. We quote again from the N. C. Daily News:—

"Not far from the back door of the Boys' School just mentioned was the entrance to the Brethren Mission occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Kingham (English) with two children. Morning service was still going on when Mr. Kingham was warned to flee. He came outside and was immediately attacked. His wife came running to him, and was struck down too. An officer of the City Guard coming by at the moment endeavoured to rescue them, and succeeded in getting them upstairs. But some friends came in and drove them with blows into the garden, whence both husband and wife rushed for safety into a pond in the garden. They were dragged from this and again beaten. Rescue came, and chairs were prepared to take them away, but the mob got the upper hand again, and they were taken once more into the house, the doors of which were sealed. But the seals were no use against the mob. Some men broke into the house at the back, and Mrs. Kingham was killed and thrown with her husband into the pond. Mr. Kingham had still some life in him, but he expired at about 7 p.m. They had been stripped of all their clothing, and their fate was as bitter as it could be. The plucky amah rushed down the street, bearing the youngest child in her arms. Though beaten and wounded several times about the head and face, she got her precious charge away uninjured. The elder child, a pretty girl, was fearfully injured about the head, but was still alive when the rescuing party got her on board the Governor's launch for Kiukiang. She has died since.

As our contemporary points out, the one bright spot in the blackness of the tragedy was the pluck of the amah who saved the baby at the risk of her own life. In all the massacres of foreigners which have stained China's modern annals tales such as this have been recorded, and it was the same in India during the Mutiny: the love and devotion of the native servants saving many a child or defenceless woman from a terrible fate.

Thursday, March 15.

A long account of the events leading up to the recent murders at Nanchang, which is stated to be the official report made by the Roman Catholic Bishop to the French authorities has appeared in Shanghai.

It seems that on the 22nd the sub-prefect arrived at the Mission at 3 p.m. All through the dinner he avoided reference to the Sinchang affair, but continually complained that he was not properly appreciated by his superiors. It was not until he had risen from the table that the magistrate mentioned the affair he had proposed to discuss, and he then propounded a series of conditions. Mr. Lacruche began to doubt if the magistrate had any authority to treat at all, asked him to put his demands in writing, in order that they might be referred to the higher ecclesiastical authorities. He offered a pencil for the purpose, but the magistrate preferred to go into the room of the priest's secretary, where he was left alone to write. A quarter of an hour passed. During that interval Chiang came to the door of the secretary's room and called a soldier, to whom he gave an order in a low voice, and who then hastily quitted the Mission. The magistrate returned to the room and told a servant who was sent to him with tea that he did not wish to be disturbed. He closed the door. Some moments later a servant, crossing the hall, heard groans coming from the secretary's room. He looked in and saw the magistrate stretched on a long chair bleeding from the neck and trying to enlarge the wound. The servant informed the missionary, who having discovered the magistrate's attempt at suicide, hurried off at once to the Governor to report what had occurred. At the Mission meanwhile every attention was paid to the wounded magistrate, who was unable to speak but made signs for a pencil with which, lying in the long chair, he wrote during that night and the following morning a number of short letters. One was addressed to Mr. Lacruce, another to the interpreter. The purport of each was that the magistrate was dying to save the people of Sinchang and not to break his word to those whom he had promised to save. In a letter to his brother he said: "An evil spirit is pursuing me; and I am dying in order to save the people."

STATE PURCHASE OF RAILWAYS.

Tuesday, March 13.

Excitement over this project prevails throughout the country and sympathy with the attitude taken by Mr. Kato Takaaki—the late Minister for Foreign Affairs—towards the whole question of the purchase of the railways is very strong. The Japanese press is almost without exception, opposed to the measure. The columns of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun have for days past been occupied with long articles which set forth very clearly the serious objections, legal, financial and economic, that may be advanced against the proposed action of the Saionji Cabinet. There seems to be little hope of the rejection of the Bill in the House of Representatives, though Count Okuma's party is doing its best to induce the Daido Club members to vote against it. Had Mr. Kato entertained any hopes of the rejection of the Bill by the Diet it is not probable that he would have resigned. The reasons for his resignation were stated in the Nichi Nichi Shimbun immediately after his resignation was accepted. His objections to the bill are three in number. (1) In that it forces private companies to sell their property despite the fact that the Law has already guaranteed its tenure by them for a lengthy period,—(25 years),—the Bill constitutes a serious infringement of individual rights, and is contrary to the spirit of the constitution and, if passed, is likely to do infinite harm. (2) The purchase of the railways by the State, if carried out, will involve another huge loan and this at a time when the country is already overburdened with debt. The proposed measure would seriously interfere with the contemplated consolidation of the public debt and other important financial measures. (3) The Government takes it for granted that it can administer the purchased railways in such a manner that they will become a valuable asset to the State, that huge profits will certainly be forthcoming. But the history of these railways hitherto and the experience of experts in railway traffic do not warrant the optimism with which the Government is taking up this gigantic enterprise. Mr. Kato tells us that before deciding to resign he stated his views very fully to members of the Cabinet, but failed to get any support and hence he resolved that it was his duty to the country to make a public protest against a policy so fraught with manifold risks as this projected state purchase of all Japan's railways. What will be the attitude of the House of Peers to the bill is not quite certain. The Kenkyukai members are said to be in favour of it. Such opposition as there is so far lacks organization. If the Bill passes the Lower House it is highly improbable that it will be negatived in the House of Peers.

The Jiji Shimpō gives an estimate as to the attitude of members of the Lower House as follows:—

	Supporting.	Opposing.	Unknown.
Seiyu-kai .....	110	20	15
Progressists ...	13	80	5
Seiko Club ...	10	20	3
Daido Club ...	20	10	—

The attitude of the Daido Club is uncertain.

In view of the proposed nationalization of railways in Japan, the bill for which is now before a Committee of the Diet, the following article from the New York Outlook concerning German state-owned railways as compared with American roads is interesting:—

The advantages and disadvantages of government ownership of railways as exemplified in Germany are set forth in a popular and interesting way by Mr. Charles Edward Russell in the current number of Everybody's Magazine. In point of speed American railways are undoubtedly superior, and there is a great deal about the military discipline and excessive formality and rigidity of system in the German management that would seem irksome and absurd to Americans. A most amusing pen-picture, for instance, is given by Mr. Russell of the pompous station-master of "Homburg-Homburg," with his magnificent uniform and grandiose supervision of the departure of a train. But in the essentials of comfort, cheapness, and convenience there is much to praise in the German roads. Mr. Russell says, "As nothing need be scrimped or stolen to make up dividends on watered stock and fraudulent bonds, the outfit is uniformly good, the roadbeds and track are in excellent condition, and the stations great roomy places, often of elaborate and handsome design." The trains are seldom late, and accidents are almost unknown. Mr. Russell asserts that although the German roads carry nine hundred million passengers a year, almost none meet with accidents, and that in America more people are killed in a week by the railway than in Germany in a year. The cheapness of passenger rates may be judged from the fact that there are fourth-class cars in which the peasantry may travel at the rate of less than a cent a mile. A sleeping-car compartment with two berths closed off by itself, from Berlin to Frankfurt, costs only $2.50. There are liberal reductions for round trips, circular tours, and workmen's tickets. Private ownership of railways in Germany almost passed away since 1871, when the first experiment in this direction was made. To-day twenty-nine out of every thirty-two miles of railway in Germany are owned by Government. Moreover, the business is made to pay. It is computed that the net annual profits of all State-owned railways for ten years have been between five and six per cent. This is just so much taken from the taxes needed to pay Government expenses. The traveler helps pay the taxes, and the contribution even from foreign travelers is no inconsiderable amount. It is certain that Germany in acquiring railways was not actuated by the desire of putting into practice any theory of State Socialism, but by the wish to get money to help pay her enormous military and other Government charges. Moreover, as Mr. Russell puts it, "the Government woke up in 1871 to recognize two facts: first, that whoever owns a country's transportation service owns the country; and, second, that it needed the national highway for national use." Prussia took the lead, and at the outset all the objections advanced by opponents of the idea in America were strenuously urged—that it would be a wrongful interference with private rights, that the vested interests of private companies could not be ignored nor purchased cheaply, that widows and orphans who owned railway stock and bonds would suffer. According to the account given by Mr. Russell, all this was overcome by one man—a "man with iron will, unbeatable and unturnable, who kept hammering away until he got what he wanted." Albert von Maybach, of the Prussian Ministry, "went quietly into the stock market and bought the control of one or two railroads. On these he instantly slashed all rates and reached out for all the business." This brought the private companies to terms one by one, and a fair system of compensation was carried out. At present an Imperial Railway Department at Berlin harmonizes and co-ordinates the work of the different roads and enforces uniformity of method and fairness of charges—just as our Inter-State Commerce Commission should do if it had the power. Freight rates are probably a little higher than in America, but the classification is simple, the rates are the same to everybody, and are not changed arbitrarily or through favoritism. To quote once more from Mr. Russell's conclusions: "So far as any outsider can discover, there is no grafting, and assuredly there is no stock juggling, bond juggling, rate juggling, rebates, discriminations, thefts, under-billing, wrong classifications, skin games, and frauds on shippers. Every shipper knows exactly what he pays and what his competitors pay, and the chief complaint of the American shipper is absolutely unknown."

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE DIET BY THE CABINET.

A correspondent writes:—There are Japanese writers who affirm that the present Cabinet is bent on curtailing private enterprise as much as possible. They cite a number of Bills lately sent to the Diet as a proof of this assertion. It is pointed out, for instance, that the Bill which aims at limiting the price of salt and imposing a fine of from 5 yen to 200 yen as a penalty for charging more than the fixed amount for salt savours of the old Tokugawa days for downright arbitrariness. The salt market if let alone will regulate itself. The law of supply and demand and competition, if not interfered with, settles prices in a fairly equitable manner. No article can well be sold at the same price despite varying rates of transport and other circumstances affecting prices. Whether the Bills presented to the Diet were originally projected by the Saionji Cabinet we very much doubt. In reference to the Bill for the Nationalization of Railways Marquis Saionji remarked the other day:—"This measure has long been in contemplation. We think the present a suitable time for endeavoring to put it into practice." We think it most probable that most of the Bills now under the consideration of the Diet were drafted by the Katsura Cabinet. Great surprise has been expressed by some newspapers that a man of such enlightened views and so highly educated as Dr. Sakatani, the Minister of Finance, should give his consent to such a thoroughly despotic measure as the revised salt-selling Bill. The members of the present Cabinet, say some critics, ignore public opinion altogether, and hence show that they have no wish to see constitutional government established in this country. In England Cabinets are bound to base their policies on public opinion or go out of power. Here our Government apparently can act as arbitrarily as it pleases and still hold on to the reins of State. It seems to us that what is wanting in Japan is thorough criticism of Government measures in the Diet. The spirit of compromise is carried too far and the command of a majority in the Lower House such as the Government now has is not conducive to wise legislation by any means. The Seiyu-kai members are not free to say what they really think about each Bill that comes before the House. Hence it happens that lively discussion seldom takes place in either Chamber. More independent members is the great desideratum of the Japanese Diet.

Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, who spent such a strenuous life during mid-Victorian times as a reformer, has passed away in England full of years and honours. In an interesting appreciation in the current Athena, we learn that his last words, whispered to a friend, were Landor's:—

"I warmed both hands before the fire of life; It sinks, and I am ready to depart."

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught arrived at Kobe at 12.30 p.m. on March 8th by the cruiser Diadem from Ujina being escorted by the Tatsuta, Manshu Maru, Yakumo, Iwate, Adzuma, Chihaya, and four destroyers. The Iki (formerly Nicholai I) Okinoshima (formerly Apprazin), Chiyoda and Nitaka under Vice-Admiral Dewa, which were stationed at Kobe to welcome His Highness, dressed ship and fired salutes, and all the crews on board the respective ships gave three cheers. At 2.30 p.m., His Highness landed. At the hatoba, the citizens and foreigners welcomed him and Mr. Okada, Assistant Mayor, and an address of welcome to the Prince. His Highness briefly replied and returned his thanks. A beautiful flower basket was presented to him by a young Japanese lady. Subsequently His Highness proceeded to the British Consulate where some five hundred British residents were present to welcome him. Here he received a loyal address. At 4.30 p.m., His Highness left Kobe for Kyoto via Osaka. The foreign settlement and the Japanese town were dressed with British and Japanese flags combined, and handsome arches were erected at several places.

At 5.13 p.m. (on March 8th) His Highness reached the Umeda Railway Station, Osaka. Many high officers of the Osaka Division and officials as well as the representatives of various public bodies numbering about four thousand, were present in the enclosure of the station. They extended to the Prince the usual welcome and presented some flower baskets. After the lapse of about five minutes the Royal train left for Kyoto.

A little after nine o'clock on the morning of March 9th, Mr. Saigo, Mayor of Kyoto, proceeded to the Miyako Hotel and presented to His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught an address of welcome on behalf of the citizens. Subsequently, His Highness visited the old Imperial Palace and the Nijo Palace. At 11 a.m., His Highness proceeded to the shop of the well-known silk dealer, Takashimaya, where he purchased various kinds of embroidery. Later he drove to the shop of another silk dealer, Nishimura Boyeki-ten. Mr. Nishimura, the head of the firm, offered for the Prince's acceptance as presents two pieces of embroidery, being portraits of His Majesty King Edward and His Royal Highness Prince Arthur, worked on a velvet ground. His Highness purchased several silk articles. At 3 p.m., he was conducted to the Omiya Detached Palace, where he saw many ancient relics specially collected by the Municipality from wealthy merchants and Buddhist and Shinto temples. At the Butoku-Den he was entertained with exhibitions of fencing and jujitsu and other performances. The same day, the Kyoto City Office presented to his Highness a Japanese silk kimono and a pair of screens embroidered in silk. In the evening he saw the miyako-odori at the Kabu Renshu-jo, a singing and dancing institution, which was organized by the municipality in his honour. Wild boar hunting had been officially fixed to take place on March 10th. Owing to snow still lying on the hill-sides and in the valleys, Prince Arthur did not participate in the sport. Sir Claude MacDonald, some of the Prince's party, and the Imperial Reception Committee left the Miyako Hotel at 6.30 a.m. for the scene of the hunting. The party proceeded to the Sotani hunting place employing palanquins at Kami-kamo. The game shot before noon were one wild boar and two deer, and in the afternoon two deer. At 4.30 p.m. the sport finished.

His Highness paid a visit to a few of the fine art shops escorted by Governor Omori, and other gentlemen.

In the evening, a grand dinner party was held at the Miyako Hotel. Colonel Arthur Davidson, who took part in the hunting, related incidents of the chase, by which His Highness was much entertained.

The cabinet presented to the Prince by the British community of Kobe was a fine specimen of Japanese craftsmanship. It came from the atelier of Komai, of Kyoto. The Kobe Herald says of it:—Over a groundwork of steel, exquisite scenes had been worked in gold. The views comprised that of Kyoto from the temple named Toji, and the so-called Gold and Silver Pavilions and Kyo-midzu Temple, the last named of which the Prince became familiar with during his fleeting visit to Kyoto earlier in the month. The door of the cabinet was made of shibuichi metal. Other decorations showed views round Fuji San and the peerless snow-capped mountain itself, which Japanese artists always revel in depicting. A suitable inscription had been engraved on the lower part of the Cabinet. The Address tendered by the British community was inscribed on a background of brocade supplied by S. Iida "Takashimaya," the mounting was by Yokohama, and the "fukusa" by Shimo Daimaru.

From the same journal we learn that after receiving the address Prince Arthur was the recipient of bouquets of flowers from the hands of some little maids dressed in white, all of whom were immensely pleased at the manner in which their gifts were acknowledged. The little ladies' names were Millicent Fearon, Marguerite Why-mark, Betty Melhuish, and Dorothy Campbell. Daphne Pakenham and Doris Cooper presented bouquets to General Kuroki and Admiral Togo. Miss Konishi Fusako had the honour of presenting one of her own paintings and was rewarded by quite a long conversation with H. R. H.

The British reception committee comprised Messrs. H. Bonar (Consul and Chairman), J. B. Rentiers (Vice-Consul), H. B. Blow (Kyoto), W. Campbell, W. W. Campbell, Rev. G. Chapman (Osaka), C. N. Crosse, A. Curtis (Hon. Secretary), Dandawalla, Bishop Foss, A. H. Groom, A. N. Hansell, G. Jones, H. Lucas, J. Marshall, J. M. Moses, P. D. Saktatvala, F. E. White, G. H. Whymark, A. Woolley, and Yap Hok Ling.

His Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught paid a visit to Nara on March 11th, leaving Shichijo Railway Station, Kyoto, at 9.30 a.m. On arrival at Nara, Governor Kono, Mayor Matsui, and other officials welcomed him. He was conducted to the Nara Club and afterwards proceeded to the Shinto temple, Kasuga Jusha. After taking luncheon at the Club, the Prince paid a visit to the Mikasa and Temuke Hills and then went to Hachiman temple and Daibutsu. At 3.30 p.m., he returned to Kyoto.

In the evening (March 11th), His Highness was present at a banquet in the tea-house Hiranoya on Maruyama, given by Kyoto citizens in his honour. There he was entertained to dinner in Japanese style. On this occasion, the citizens presented him with Japanese kimono.

At 3.30 p.m. (March 12th) His Highness arrived at Nagoya. On the platform, Governor Fukano and other high officials and representatives of various public bodies were present and welcomed the Prince. Marchioness Tokugawa presented a beautiful flower basket, and as His Highness passed down the platform, the girls of the Nagoya female school sang the British national anthem. His Highness was conducted to the Nagoya Hotel, being escorted by a battalion of infantry. After taking a short rest, he paid a visit to the Detached Palace in the enclosure of the former Nagoya castle, and returned to the hotel at 4.40 p.m. In the evening, His Highness gave a dinner to Governor Fukano, Major-General Date, acting Commander of the Third Division, Mayor Aoyama, etc. At 9 p.m. he was present at the Misono Theatre where he was entertained with dancing, etc.

At 9 a.m. on March 13th, His Highness left Nagoya for Tokyo. He passed Hirayama Railway Station at 5.15 p.m. The Royal train passed at the ordinary speed. The Princes and Princesses of the Blood, the Ministers of State, high officials and officers, and others notables including the Corps diplomatique were present on Shimbashi platform to welcome him. The Prince drove off to the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace.

On the evening of March 13th, Marquis Saionji, Premier, entertained His Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught and suite as well as Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador, at the Mitsui Club.

His Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught left Ueno at 10.10 a.m. on March 14th for Nikko accompanied by Lord Redesdale, Admiral Sir Edward Seymour, General Sir Thomas Kelly-Kenny, Colonel Arthur Davidson, Captain Wyndham, Mr. M. W. Lampson, Mr. Nagasaki and other members of the Board of Ceremonies. Viscount Soga, President of the Nippon Railway, and Mr. Shirani, Governor of Tochigi prefecture, who had arrived in Tokyo the previous day from Nikko, were also on the Royal train. On the platform, Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador, and his staff; General Viscount Sakuma, Commander of the Tokyo Defences; General Baron Kuroki; Admiral Togo; Mr. K. Takahira, formerly Minister in Washington; Vice-Admiral Ijuin, Vice-Chief of the Naval Staff Office; Major-General Fukushima; Captain Takarabe, of the Navy; Colonel Utsunomiya, Mr. Asano, Master of the Board of Ceremonies; Count Terajima, Confidential Secretary to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, etc., were present and saw His Highness off.

The Royal train reached Utsunomiya at 12.42 p.m. Three beautiful displays of day fire-works were made and enthusiastic cheers were given on the platform where Mr. Odagiri, Secretary of the Tochigi Kencho, Judge Takahashi, President of the Tochigi District Court, Public Procurator Mukai of the same Court, Colonel Tsubaki, the members of the City Assembly, and representatives of various public bodies, etc., were present. Mrs. Shirani, wife of the Governor of Tochigi prefecture, presented to His Royal Highness a flower basket. After the lapse of five minutes, the Royal train left.

At 2.12 p.m., His Royal Highness arrived at Nikko. The railway station and all the streets were decorated. On the platform His Highness was received by the officials of the local government offices and a crowd of local citizens. By jinrikisha, His Royal Highness proceeded to the Sannai and paid a visit to the Shrines. Subsequently he went to the Kanaya Hotel and put up there. The citizens presented to the Prince silk crape and other valuable articles.

At 12.25 p.m. on March 15th His Royal Highness returned to Tokyo from Nikko. He gave a luncheon on Thursday at the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace to about twenty graduates of Cambridge university, including Marquis Hachisuka, Viscount Inaba, Baron Suyematsu, Mr. B.

Yasuhiro. On this occasion, the Imperial Reception Committee and some officials of the Imperial Household were also present.

Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador, proceeded to the Imperial Palace at 10.30 a.m. on March 15th, and was received by His Majesty the Emperor in audience. His Excellency expressed to the Emperor the sincere thanks of His Majesty King Edward for the treatment accorded to Prince Arthur in Japan.

The cruisers Yakumo, Iwate, Adzuma, and Otowa and a number of destroyers arrived at Yokohama on March 15th. They escorted His Royal Highness down the Bay.

On the departure of His Royal Highness, on Friday Yokohama citizens discharged from the Customs compound many day fire-works displaying the words "Farewell" and "Bon voyage."

THE GERMANS AS COLONISTS.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun, in a leading article, draws attention to the astonishing progress of German Colonization in Brazil. Judging from Kiaochow and several other German colonies many people, says our contemporary, have run away with the notion that the German people are ill-adapted for forming new settlements in foreign countries. But this is just the opposite of the truth. Wherever the Germans are not harassed by the obstructive policy of certain of their Government officials they make capital colonists. Their progress in Brazil is the wonder of the world. It was about 77 years ago that some 700 Germans arrived in the province of Santa Catharina from various parts and formed settlements there. Notwithstanding all the restrictions placed on immigration in Brazil between 1859 and 1896 the German population in Southern Brazil ran up to 500,000 and the Germans during that time obtained the control of territory extending over 8,000 square miles. Within this area they are to-day the predominating race in farming, industry and agriculture. Though these Germans have mostly become naturalized Brazilians, their language, their customs, their religion and their school education they have most scrupulously retained. Naturalization in Brazil has brought with it none of the assimilation that has taken place in the case of Germans in America and certain English colonies. In Brazil the Germans constitute an imperium in imperio. Is it because this is so the German Government has recently changed its policy and is now doing all it can to encourage German colonization in Brazil? It is calculated that if German immigration goes on at the present rate, by the end of the 20th century there will certainly be 20 or 30 million Germans in Brazil. In less than 50 years we are likely to see a new Germany in South America in command of territory whose area is about as big as the whole of the United States. No Monroe doctrine can stop the inflow and the rapid reproduction that is going on. The form of Government the Germans set up in Brazil is not a matter of much moment. That a big German empire will exist there is as absolutely sure as any future event can be. The colonization societies existing in Germany are extremely well organized bodies and have been adequately supplied with capital. One of these the Hansard (?) Company has a capital of 650,000 yen and a membership amounting to 3,500. It has its own newspaper and owns extensive tracts of land in the province of Santa Catharina.

Land is obtained by Germans in Brazil at very low figures owing to the intervention of the great immigration societies. But Germany is not confining herself to pouring in settlers into Brazil. She is putting in capital as well. In Northern and Central Brazil she has American, English and French competition to fear. In order not to be outdone she has invested there one hundred million yen in railways. Moreover, she is said to own one-third of the public bonds of Brazil, amounting to 160 million yen. She is paramount, too, as an owner of steamships running between North and South America and between Europe and South America. Germany's trade with Brazil has, in recent years, advanced with gigantic strides and such is the richness of the country that the future will certainly bring greater results than any hitherto achieved. If the German Government is noted for its colonial fiascoes, the German people unhampered by red-tapeism certainly make splendid colonists, concludes the Nichi Nichi Shimbun.

Above we summarize from the Nichi Nichi an article dealing with the German colonization of Brazil and contrasting the splendid results achieved in South America with the comparative failure of German colonies elsewhere. The colony of Kiaochow is referred to rather slightly and to show that there is another side to the question we reproduce a portion of a letter written to the North China Daily News by a correspondent at Tsintao:—

"I compare the German colony of to-day with what it was five years ago I must say that even the very greatest optimist could not believe a work could be so well done in so short a period as the Germans have performed here. Where eight years ago a few Chinese huts and a military camp stood you find now a fine town with beautiful streets, a band, and houses which can be taken as models for the architects in other foreign Settlements in China, even in the Model Settlement; you see a good and large harbour; and the whistle of the locomotive every now and then reminds you that in a few hours' ride you are able to travel into the heart of the province. The Government has taken special care to plant thousands and thousands of trees, partly imported, partly grown here in admirably managed botanical gardens would perhaps not be the right word—the Germans call it "Baumschulen" that means "schools in which trees are grown." In this "Forsgarten" the thousands of trees and flowers are kept long enough to require no more special care of a nursery—and then they are planted on hills round about and in the town, so that—a strange sight in China—in summer one does not see anything but green and green in the near neighbourhood, and that, of course, makes all walks in the beautiful surroundings the more agreeable. The same hotel company which built the Strand Hotel, much for the benefit of the foreigners in the East, has now opened a magnificent concert and theatre-hall, and an A.D.C. performed last week "Alt Heidelberg." The ladies and gentleman played excellently, the house was crowded, and a round surplus is left for charity purposes. The most prominent lady's part was in the hands of a Government official's wife, once—when still a Miss—a member of the Shanghai German community. You know our Band from its frequent visits to Shanghai, and it is a special pleasure you can have in none of the other ports in China, to hear after the day's work in the evening such excellent music, not exceptionally, but in regular popular, as well as classical, concerts.

But not everything shows such a pleasant picture as I have described. The times are hard and trade develops only slowly here. It would carry me too far to-day if I were to speak of commercial life in Tsintao; I reserve that for a later. Our German friends have to work hard against the competition around them, but with their general knowledge and education I am quite sure step by step they will succeed. It took more than forty years to build up the standing of Hongkong; the Germans have no right at all to expect that they will succeed more quickly. In the last few months new Customs regulations have been put in force. It took a long time before this question could be settled, but the result seems to be pleasing. What is more, the difficulties were settled without any friction; that shows beyond doubt how well-informed the two treaty parties were kept by their respective representatives here in Tsintao, the Governor and the Commissioner of Customs.

NEW PRESIDENT OF THE SPECIE BANK.

Mr. Takahashi Korekiyo, Vice-Governor of the Bank of Japan, and well known as the Japanese financial agent in London during the war, was elected President of the Yokohama Specie Bank at the late meeting of shareholders.

Mr. Soma Nagatane, the previous President, who is greatly esteemed as an able banker both by foreigners and Japanese, submitted his resignation for rather tragical reasons. He lost, a few weeks ago, his only son and a few days after his wife passed away. This greatly affected his health, and he has had to seek retirement for a time. Mr. Misaki Kamenosuke, Vice-President of the bank, being also dangerously ill from cancer of the stomach, also sent in his resignation a few days ago. Not only is the Yokohama Specie Bank the foremost organ of Japanese foreign trade, but it has other important business, especially that of the management of affairs relating to war-note circulation in Manchuria and it is generally believed that Mr. Takahashi is the ablest financier to manage such difficult business. Apart from his appointment as President of the Yokohama Specie Bank he will retain his present position as vice-governor of the Bank of Japan according to the provisions of the Yokohama Specie Bank Act. The office of vice-president of the Bank will remain vacant for the present.

CHINA.

Saturday, March 10.

Baron Mumm von Schwarzenstein, former Minister to Peking, who has been promoted German Ambassador to Tokyo, will, according to the Jiji's Peking correspondent, stay in the Chinese capital longer than was previously reported, as he has received instructions from home not to leave China before the entire settlement of the native troubles. M. G. Dubail, the French Minister, who was to start for home on leave, has postponed his departure in consequence of the Nanchang affair.

Prince Ching sent a note on March 6th to Mr. Rockhill, the American Minister. In connexion with the despatch of soldiers to the Philippines, Prince Ching said that the re-inforcement of the garrison might be supposed to be a precautionary measure on the part of America as to an apprehended outbreak of trouble in China. Still the concentration of troops in the islands has caused serious anxiety among the Chinese people, as the result of which anti-foreign feeling was fostered. Prince Ching asked the American Minister to inform his Government of the present condition of China, showing that order reigns in the interior and that the relations between the natives and foreigners are cordial and friendly.

The Governor-General of Suchuang intends to issue notes bearing two large characters "Great China," to which project the Emperor of China has given his sanction. The purpose of the Viceroy, says the Hochi's Peking correspondent, is to secure financial authority in central Asia and to impress on the natives the idea that they are under Chinese protection.

Prince Khartin of Inner-Mongolia, who is now in Peking, according to the Hochi's correspondent, recently received a telegram from his dominion to the effect that a thousand mounted bandits were committing raids and plundering the natives and that the Mongolian soldiers were unable to check their predatory incursions on account of the insufficiency of their arms. The Prince therefore purchased five hundred rifles each from German and Belgian merchants of Tientsin, and two hundred thousand cartridges from a German. He is appointing agents to carry the arms to his country. The Prince will shortly return home.

The Chinese Government has ordered the Taotai of Tientsin to investigate the Nanchang trouble.

Monday, March 12.

The Governor of Kulon has reported to the Chinese Government that the Russians there have issued a large amount of notes and are collecting Chinese silver. The Governor asked that the Department of Finance should be ordered to establish a bank in the province in order to secure financial interests from the Russians.

The Viceroy of Kirin has asked the Government to present decorations to certain Russian officers who are now in his province.

According to a trustworthy authority, says the Jiji, a large proportion of the Russian armies in Manchuria have been withdrawn. The remainder are mostly cavalry. As food-stuffs are scarce, the native merchants are reaping large profits. It is added that the local government offices are imposing a tax of one tael per vehicle carrying stores to the Russian camps.

The condition of Lieut.-General Matsunaga, Commander of the Third Division, who is undergoing treatment at Mukden, is reported to be serious. In recognition of his meritorious services during the war, the Emperor promoted him to Senior Fourth Rank.

The Japanese guards in the enclosure of Mukden castle have been removed to external positions with a view to respecting Chinese sovereignty, which is regarded to have originated there.

The Mukden branch of the Russo-Chinese bank, it is said, intends to close owing to lack of business.

Wednesday, March 14.

The Jiji has a telegram from Yingkau to the effect that a body of Hunghuts are creating disturbances in the districts of northwestern Manchuria, and that even Mukden is suffering from their frequent raids. One regiment of Chinese infantry has been despatched to Kinchow to settle the troubles caused by the mounted banditti, whose actions there have been most violent. A later report says that in consequence of the vehemence of the Hunghuts, the Chinese Government has decided to station a division in Kinchow. The authorities have commenced the work of constructing barracks there.

It is reported in official telegrams that the ice on the Peiho melted on March 10th and that at Taku on the following day.

The Russo-Chinese negotiations seem almost at a standstill. The Peking correspondent of the Kokumin reports that the members of the conference are equally perplexed. On March 10th, Viceroy Tung Chao-yi paid a visit to the Russian Legation, and the following day, M. Pokotiloff proceeded to the Waiwupu. When the Russian Minister paid his visit to the Chinese Foreign Office, he was accompanied by the German Minister. The event has led to much conjecture.

The trouble in Nanchang, according to latest news from Hongkong, has been entirely settled. The foreign gun-boats are still at Nanchang and Kiukiang.

Thursday, March 15.

The Chinese Government has decided to construct a railway between Holan and Aihon via Tsitsihar. The Asahi's Peking correspondent says that the decision shows the Chinese Government to be preparing to refuse the concessions demanded by Russia.

Mr. Chou former Taotai, who was recently appointed one of the commissioners on the Russo-Chinese Conference, was released from duty on March 13th. It may be remembered that Mr. Chou had been hitherto regarded as a pro-Russian and there had been some agitation against him on the ground that he was a spy employed by the Russians.

The Imperial Chinese Government has decided to pay taels 1,200,000 to Great Britain on behalf of Tibet, owing to the latter's inability to reimburse the cost of the recent British expeditionary force, as provided for in the Anglo-Tibetan Treaty. The decision of the Chinese Government was reported to the Dalai Lama through the Resident at Lhasa.

The Russian Consul at Kasihar has applied to the Chinese Government through the Tartar-General concerned, for a concession in that town. The Russian official says that Russian residents are increasing there and under auspices the place is growing in prosperity. The Waiwupu instructed the Tartar-general to refuse the Russian application, giving as a reason that the place is merely a commercial depot preferred for commercial communications between Russia and China and is not a city opened to foreign trade.

The Chinese and Russian representatives have resumed the negotiations which had been suspended for many days owing to the illness of M. Pokotiloff. At this meeting, the envoys discussed matters referring to concessions on the Amur, granted by the Governor of that district without reference to the central authorities.

French and British warships have left Nanchang on March 13th for Shanghai on account of the settlement of the trouble.

The body of the magistrate of Nanchang who was alleged to have committed suicide after an assault by a Catholic priest, has again been examined by British and American doctors. They certified that the death of the Chinese magistrate could not be attributed to suicidal injuries.

Friday, March 16.

Great Britain has asked the Chinese Government to open Uchientin, in Kiangsi, for foreign trade. The Asahi's Peking correspondent says that the request is made in connection with the trouble at Nanchang.

The Chinese Minister in Berlin has transmitted to the Waiwupu an intimation he received from the German Government, to the effect that the German Government never believed that anti-foreign feeling exists in China; Germany will withdraw her soldiers from Chihli before the due time; rumours with regard to Germany's intention to further her influence in Shantung are baseless; the friendliest relations between Germany and China will continue in all sincerity. The Chinese Minister adds that though Germany will probably withdraw her soldiers from North China, she, however, is strengthening the forts at Tsintao, for the purpose of increasing her influence in Shantung and by that means of attaining equality of power in East Asia.

Says the Writer of Notes on Native Affairs in the North China Daily News:

Telegraphic news has been received from Peking that the gendarmes of the Board of Public Safety (Hsunchiungpu) discovered on Saturday a parcel of bombs at the Machiapu Railway Terminus. The Ministers of the Board of Public Safety, in conjunction with the officers commanding the newly-organised foreign-modelled Manchurian troops in the city, at once trebled the number of gendarmes and troops around the Palace precincts, while strong detachments of men were held in readiness in the Tatar City prepared for all emergencies. All these preparations naturally caused a number of alarmist reports to circulate about the capital, creating much unrest, amounting almost to panic. By yesterday afternoon, however, owing to the promptitude of those in office and the knowledge that the authorities were prepared for everything, people became more assured and at the time of the dispatch of this news there was a quieter feeling. Just about the time of the discovery of the bombs it so happened that the Chief Eunuch Li Lien-ying had displeased either the Empress Dowager of Emperor about something or other, resulting in the command being issued that his presence was not required in the Palace. Li Lien-ying, therefore, had to leave the precincts instantly. This incident does not, however, seem to possess any political significance, for this is not the first time in the history of the Palace that Li Lien-ying has been ordered out of the presence nor, indeed, will it be the last—at least, so long as the Empress Dowager reigns supreme. The procedure, hitherto, has been, in such an instance, for the eunuch to obey the irate mandate of his Imperial Master or Mistress to leave the Palace and quietly await for the Imperial wrath to diminish, when he will come again cringing and humble to beg and receive pardon.

Tung Fu-shiang, the ex-Kansu General of Boxer fame, is now a perfect nonentity as far as power for evil goes. His was a name to be conjured with and feared prior to 1900, says the N.C. Daily News, because he had then behind him some 20,000 devoted troops, hailing from the same province as himself. Of these 20,000 men not one-tenth is left, the other nine-tenths having been killed in the attack on the legations, in subsequent fighting with the Allies outside Peking, or now dead from wounds received in these battles. The remaining couple of thousand men are not now banded together, but are scattered throughout the Shen-Kan provinces as private citizens and tillers of the soil. Moreover, Tung Fu hsiang is nearly eighty-five years of age and without the necessary energy and fire to stir up evil. Finally he is a staunch Buddhist and is a determined opponent of Mahomedanism.

The report of the Taku Tug & Lighter Co., Ltd., for 1905 shows a divisible balance, after the payment in July last of an interim dividend of 4 per cent, of T. Tls. 217,628. It is proposed to carry Tls. 110,000 to depreciation account and Tls. 20,000 to equalisation of dividends, to pay a final dividend of 4 per cent, making 8 per cent for the year, and to carry forward the balance, Tls. 13,914.

Sir Ernest Satow has pointed out to the Chinese Government the great benefit to south-western China of the proposed railway from Burma to T'engyueh, but the Waiwupu still protests.

It is reported that as the result of the Russo-Chinese negotiations, the towns of Manchurli, Aihun, and Hunchun, near the Siberian border, will be opened to Russian trade, under the charge of Sir Robert Hart.

The Ministers of Italy, Holland, Belgium, Austria, and finally France, have consented to the withdrawal of the garrisons at Tientsin and Peking; only the British and American Ministers are holding out.

The report for 1905 of the China Fire Insurance Co., Ltd., whose paid-up capital is $400,000, and whose reserves amount to $1,229,488, shows a divisible balance on the working of 1904 of $131,488. It is proposed to pay a dividend of $6 per share, equal to 30 per cent, and add the balance to extra reserve. The balance at credit of 1905 working account is $344,099.

The high provincial authorities have received telegraphic instructions from the Board of Education of Peking to discontinue sending any more students for short courses abroad at Government expense. In future only those Chinese students will be sent abroad to complete their education, who have already attained a certain proficiency.

Apparently in pursuance of the intention to secure uniformity in the national coinage the Board of Revenue has memorialized the Throne to the effect that from the last day of the 4th moon of this year all the mints for silver and copper in the various provinces shall be placed under the control of the Board of Revenue and that the mints for silver and copper coins in Honan, Kwangtung, Kiangnan, Fukien and Hupeh shall henceforth be called the Central, Eastern, Western, Southern and Northern mints of the Hupu. Mints in other places are to be made branch offices of the five main mints respectively, and all the profits and accounts will be examined from time to time by the Hupu which will have the sole control of all the mints in China.

In Hanoi, according to L'Avenir du Tonkin, a number of leading Chinese merchants in the town have abandoned their long silk garments and donned European attire, their queues also disappearing.

A Tientsin dispatch, translated by the N.-C. Daily News, states that under instructions of the Waiwupu, or rather of Prince Ching, who is Comptroller-General of that Board, H. E. Viceroy Yuan Shih-k'ai, Imperial High Commissioner of the Peiyang Administration, has appointed His Honour Liang Tun-yen, Tientsin Customs Taotai, etc., to proceed to Nanchang to investigate matters and to settle, if possible, terms with the Representatives of the two Powers concerned, who have also gone there to investigate. Special Commissioner Taotai Liang Tun-yen is a man of strict probity, able, and of broad and enlightened views, which is only what ought to be expected from him, as he is a member of Yale University, of the class of 1882, where his standing in his class was of a high order. Special Commissioner Liang Tun-yen was, for many years prior to going to take up the Tientsin Taotai ship, a confidential member of Viceroy Chang Chih-tung's suite at Wuchang, and possessed His Excellency's perfect confidence—a rare thing with the old Viceroy—so much so that His Excellency got Liang Taotai appointed Taotai of Hankow in 1903, over the heads of a number of other Taotai senior to him in length of service in Hupeh province.

KOREA.

A Japanese has been killed by the "fire-banditti" in the district of Hanjou, near Chinnampo. On receipt of the news, a number of gendarmes were sent from Seoul.

In the afternoon of March 9th, His Excellency Marquis Ito, proceeded to the Imperial Palace, being escorted by General Hasegawa, Commander of the troops; Mr. Tsuruhara, Superintendent of General Affairs of the Residency-General; Admiral Inouye; Messrs. Kiuchi and Oka, secretaries, and other high officials and presented his credentials to His Majesty.

About two hundred natives of the northern district of Kyongsing appear to have made an attack on the district office. The Japanese gendarmes disposed of them. The Koreans had a difference with the local government office as to the imposition of taxes and this seems to have been the cause of the trouble.

The Korean Department of Agriculture, Commerce and Industry intends to establish an iron foundry, employing Japanese engineers, to which end the authorities are now conducting investigations.

The withdrawal of the guards in Korea has begun, their departure being arranged as follows:—March 13th, 321 by the Nanyetsu Maru at Fusan; the 11th, 195 by the Keiki Maru; the 19th, 1,557 by the Kotohira Maru; the 20th, 619 by the Atago Maru; and the 21st, 733 by the Aki Maru, the last four batches at Chemulpo.

The Korean Government intends to start a school for the children of noblemen.

An explosion occurred on March 9th in an ammunition magazine at Songju, not far from Seoul. Two men were killed.

Marquis Ito, Resident-General, had audience of His Majesty the Emperor of Korea on the afternoon of March 9th and presented his credentials. His Majesty spoke graciously saying that he was much gratified by the arrival of the Marquis and asking him to use his best efforts to lead the Emperor's subjects into enlightened ways. The Resident-General presented to the Emperor and to the members of the Cabinet costly Nishijin silk, silver and other articles.

Genyongchi, a ringleader of the recent rioters, who was arrested by Japanese gendarmes, has died in prison. He was still under preliminary examination.

At 1.30 p.m. on March 12th fire broke out in an engine-shed at the Masampo Railway Station, destroying it. Two locomotives were damaged.

To celebrate the arrival of Marquis Ito in Seoul, the Department of Communications has issued illustrated post-cards.

Mr. Soyeda, President of the Industrial Bank, as the result of a conference with Marquis Ito, has decided to start a special banking business for encouraging Korean agricultural, industrial and commercial enterprises. For this purpose, he has invited investments by Koreans.

The Emperor of Korea has conferred decorations on the military attaches of the Resident-General:—First Class of the Tai-keuk on Lieut.-Generals Inouye and Kigoshi; Second Class of the same Order on Major-Generals Sasaki and Ota; Third Class of the same Order on Lieut.-Colonel Iwakura; and Second Class of the Palkwai on Major Ohara.

In the Imperial Korean Court, a proposal that Li Yongyok now a political refugee in Japan, should be pardoned and be recalled home has been set on foot.

On March 14th, Marquis Ito, Resident-General, held a conference in his office with the Korean Ministers of State. At the conclusion of the interview they all proceeded to the Palace and His Excellency explained to His Majesty the Emperor his views regarding the steps to be taken by him in the future. The essential points are:—(1) The Resident-General will support the present Cabinet and will give all necessary assistance; (2) the Korean Cabinet is responsible for the improvement of the administration; (3) the Korean authorities must endeavour to promote agriculture and commerce in order to increase the national wealth; and (4) to meet Korea's present necessities, the Japanese Government will make a loan to Korea (rumour says that the sum will be ten million yen). The Emperor of Korea is reported to have expressed profound satisfaction with this programme.

The Kokumin has a telegram from Seoul that two Koreans have been arrested by Japanese gendarmes. They are alleged to be the men who attempted to murder General Keun-thaik, Minister for War.

The following notes on Korean matters are from the Seoul Press Weekly of March 3rd:—

A report has reached Seoul that the inhabitants of On-Yang had risen in revolt, and declared their intention of destroying all the Japanese houses there. A body of gendarmes were accordingly despatched from Sung-Wan but they found the rioters had dispersed. The disturbance was not of a political nature, and was caused by the lawless conduct of some Japanese coolies.

We understand that by an Imperial Decree, the marriage of the Crown Prince of Korea has been postponed until the third moon.

Further details received respecting the recent fire which broke out on a train on the Masampo line prove that it was more serious than was anticipated. Four men and five women perished in the flames, and eight others are seriously injured. The injured persons were conveyed to premises belonging to the Railway Company, where they are under medical treatment.

It is generally known that the Emperor of Korea does not look with favour on the Il Chin Hoi, but lately, according to a native contemporary, this feeling on the part of His Majesty, and his councillors appears to be passing away, and as a proof of it we are informed that one of the leading members of the Il Chin Hoi has been appointed Chief Judge of the Supreme Court and Mr. So-Sang-Tai, another prominent Il Chin Hoi member, Police-Inspector General.

The death is announced of the former Korean Prime Minister, Mr. Sim Soon-tak, which took place at his country residence in the An-San district.

When the present Korean Cabinet Council was formed, it was intended and hoped that all private animosity and political intrigues would be put aside and a unity of thought and interests would prevail, thereby giving a stimulus to the many schemes for the advancement of Korea in Agricultural, Commercial, and Industrial projects. For a time harmony prevailed among the members of the Cabinet, but since the attack upon the life of

Mr. Yi Keun-tak the principles upon which the Cabinet was founded seem to be in danger of becoming weak and lukewarm. It is said that quarrels and dissensions have of late prevailed amongst the Cabinet Ministers and that the Council is divided into cliques neither of which will agree to act in accordance with the other. In consequence at the meetings discord rules and questions proposed are seldom satisfactorily settled.

From October of last year until January of the present year, accounts have been received from time to time of the raids made by piratical boats on the vessels engaged in the coast trade in the waters around Masan, Mokpo, and Lunsan. So frequent and successful were these sea-robbers in the attacks they made upon the coasting vessels, that trade was seriously impaired, and in response to appeals from the residents of Mokpo, Japanese gendarmes were despatched to the above named ports and endeavours were made to capture the pirates at their rendezvous on one or two of the small islands in that neighbourhood, but their efforts were not a success, for upon one occasion the gendarmes were surprised by the pirates and two of their company were killed. In January, therefore, three Japanese destroyers were sent from Japan with instructions to scour the coast and suppress this illicit trade. The fear of these armed ships upon the pirates was quickly shewn, for they dispersed and the attacks upon coasting vessels became few and far between. At the end of January rumours again prevailed that a piratical vessel was observed in the neighbourhood of Chong-Do, and accordingly two destroyers were at once sent to patrol those waters, without, however, being successful in obtaining a sight of the reported ship. The raids having ceased, and the trade no longer being molested, it is concluded that no further danger is to be anticipated from these lawless marauders.

A recent trip as far as Syenchun, up near Wiju, on the military railway, gave me an opportunity of seeing the progress of the work and the preparation the Japanese are making towards taking care of the commerce and other matters of this country. The fertility of the farms, the rather sparse population and the areas uncultivated make one realize that future possibilities here are great. The road is continuous except at the Anju river, where the bridge, about 3 miles below the old city, is not completed yet, has to be crossed a foot. The piers are finished but the stringers are not in place so passengers and freight are transferred across the temporary structure. There is but little delay or inconvenience, so no complaint; everybody being delighted to get along as it is. The last time I went up the road took over 3 days where now by rail it takes about half a day.

Here in Pyengyang, there is evidence that the spring will see much building. The population, Japanese and Korean, has steadily increased all the winter and, despite the cold, there has been considerable building going on.

NATIONALIZATION OF THE RAILWAYS.

[CONTRIBUTED.]

The assumption that for a thing to be done well in this country means that it must be done by the Government, though long since discarded by the most enlightened Japanese, seems to be very strongly held by a large section of officialdom and by a goodly number of non-official conservatives who still cling to old Tokugawa ways of looking at things in general. There are Japanese writers who regard with no little alarm the recent attitude of the Government towards private enterprises. To them it seems that the Government is aiming at getting every paying concern into its own hands. The chief reason for the proposed purchase of the railways is alleged to be the profits that will accrue from them later on, for no advocate of this measure has accused the present owners of these railways of want of consideration for State interests in time of war. That the Government can manage the railways more economically than they are now managed is open to doubt. Taking general business and general organization as a test, he would be a very bold man who should affirm that Government offices in Japan are better managed than great private business houses like the Mitsui, and the Mitsu Bishi Companies, the Specie Bank and scores of other flourishing non-official concerns. As for education, it seems to be quite agreed that a big private institution like the Waseda Semmon Gakko does far more good and lasting work with the money at its disposal than is done by Government Schools. The notion that the Government commands the best intellect of the country, so confidently championed by men like Mr. Sawayanagi Masataro, is contradicted by facts. In England it has been always acknowledged that private business houses are better run than Government Departments. Our belief is that if the comparison between official business and non-official business be limited to comparing Government Departments with well established and thoroughly reliable Japanese private firms, in every case victory will be with the private firms. The March 3rd number of the Tokyo Keizai Zasshi, a magazine which still maintains the Taguchi standard of excellence, contains a number of scathing criticisms of recent Government action. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce and the Department of Finance are both blamed for their attitude to private business enterprises. The Tokyo Keizai Zasshi has no confidence in the administration of the Finance Department and hopes to see it reformed by Mr. Sakatani. But to come back to the subject of the nationalization of the railways, in Sunday's Nichi Nichi Shimbun appears a second statement of Mr. Kato Takaaki, in which he answers certain charges of inconsistency that have been brought against him. It seems that he first sent in his resignation on Feb. 28th. On March 1st or 2nd, he is not sure which, as a member of the Cabinet he formally gave his consent to the purchase by the Japanese Government of the Seoul-Fusan line of railway in Korea. This, it is alleged, was acting inconsistently. If he objected to the State purchase of railways in principle, why did he agree to the Government's purchasing the Korean line? His answer is that the two cases were entirely different. The whole history of the building and the strategic uses of the Seoul-Fusan line made the State purchase of that railway desirable. Though built by a private company, it was practically owned by the Government during the war. This purchase does not in any way affect Japanese legal ownership of property in this country. The proposed purchase of all private railways here will, if carried out arbitrarily, rob private individuals of the rights granted to them during 25 years. Though it is true that what the Law gives the Law can take away, such a radical alteration in the Law as that contemplated by the framers of the Bill now before the Diet ought to be based on State exigencies that do not at present exist in this country. The nationalization of railways is not to-day an indispensable measure. The proposed step is not taken to save the country from great peril or to avoid a threatened calamity. It is merely a commercial undertaking whose ultimate success is by no means assured. Mr. Kato denies that he agrees in principle with the State purchase of railways while objecting to the methods of purchase proposed by the Saionji Cabinet. He disapproves of the nationalization of railways in this country altogether. To the insinuation that he was been largely influenced by the views of the heads of the Mitsu Bishi Company in the action he has taken, he does not think it worth while to reply. This and a number of other idle rumours do not deserve to be seriously discussed.

To the Government plea that the proposed purchase of railways has for its chief objects, (1) The adoption of a uniform system throughout the whole country which will greatly facilitate the rapid transport of goods and passengers; (2) the reduction of rates on all the lines, the Asahi Shimbun replies at great length, showing that the adoption of a uniform system and the reduction of rates would, if carried out, render substantial profits very uncertain.

Last Sunday's Fiji Shimpō goes minutely into the financial aspects of the proposed purchase. In order to avoid an awkward disturbance of the state of the money market, the Government proposes to effect the purchase within the space of five years, borrowing money by degrees when needed. This scheme, the Fiji thinks, will not attain its object, as projected loans always do affect the money market. Japanese bonds generally will certainly suffer if it be announced that the Government has decided to borrow within 5 years the sum of 479,800,000 yen, the alleged purchase price of the railways. But, continues the Fiji, there is a greater question than the disturbance of the money market connected with the proposed measure which demands serious consideration. It is this. Can confidence be placed in the accuracy of the calculations on which the Government places so much reliance? Stated briefly they are as follows:—It is proposed to pay the interest on the loan out of the proceeds of the railways, to pay for all improvements out of the same fund and then to pay back the money loaned by means of these same proceeds within 30 years. Will the profits be sufficiently big to allow of the carrying out of this scheme? Few experts would venture to answer this question in the affirmative. The Government calculate that if they take over the railways this year; in two years' time, after paying out some 23,540,000 yen as interest on the loan, they will be in possession of a surplus of over 260,000 yen. The whole of this sum in 1908 they propose to devote to improvements of the lines. In 1909 they would only devote a portion of their net profits to improvements redeeming part of the debt with the remainder. Now, the carrying out of this plan will depend altogether on the amount of profit realized by the working of the railways, and in estimating this one can only be guided by past experience. The Government says that the profits on the railways this year being nearly 8½ per cent. on the cost of construction, they will be able in the course of a few years to raise the profit to 13 per cent. But this we take to be extremely doubtful. In 1905 the average profit of all Japan's private railways was eight and four-tenths, 8¼ per cent. on the capital required for their construction. The previous year it was only 7¾ per cent. The notion that Government owned railways are going to be made to pay better than those run by private companies is not one that will be entertained by anybody who is acquainted with the manner in which Government lines have been run hitherto. The idle boast of the Government that it can outstrip private companies will deceive nobody acquainted with the subject under discussion.

We hear a good deal about the expenses that the Government is going to reduce by uniting all the lines under one head office, but we are not told what it is going to cost to establish such an office. No State Department is run as cheaply as business companies, says the Yiji. Another point on which the Government's forecast is at fault is in the amount of money that will be required for improvements. Some of the lines to be purchased are in such a poor condition that heavy outlays will be required for alterations and improvements even during the first few years of State ownership. The sums of money spent on this will reduce the fund available for the payment of interest and the other objects specified above.

It seems to us that after all the railways have been put into proper repair and the new gigantic system has been duly organized the Government will only just manage to pay interest on their loans. As for their reducing the rates all over the country and still being able to gradually redeem the loans by means of surplus profit, it is the wildest of chimeras. As a financial scheme the proposed measure will not bear examination. If it is carried out it will land us in untold difficulties. The railways instead of becoming a valuable source of revenue may well become a perfect white elephant which the Government may be glad to put up to auction in years to come.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

* Funeral services were held at 1 p.m. on March 9th at the Buddhist Temple Hongwanji, Tsukiji, Tokyo, in honour of officers and men who died in the war. The rites were carried out with great solemnity. General Terauchi, Minister for War, Prince Kan-in, Commander of the First Army, and other high officers were present.

* The funeral services in honour of Lieutenant S. Nogi (28) and Ensign H. Nogi (26) first and second sons of General Baron Nogi, who died at Nanshan and 203-metre hill respectively, took place on March 10th at Aoyama Cemetery.

March 10th being the day officially fixed to commemorate the war, military officers held a dinner party at the Kaikosha which was attended by the Crown Prince, Prince Fushimi and Prince Kan-in.

Mr. K. Horiguchi, Secretary of the Japanese Legation in Brazil, has just returned to Japan after seven years' residence in that country. Writing in the Taiheiyō, he says that the climate of Brazil suits Japanese very well and that since the Brazilians are at present great admirers of this country it is a favourable time for Japan to send steamers there to open up a brisk trade. Japanese goods are in great request and the prices paid for them are high. In no country of the world was the enthusiasm over Japan's victories in the late war greater than in Brazil. When the news of the fall of Port Arthur reached that portion of South America the Japanese Legation was besieged by visitors coming to congratulate her representative and the telegrams that arrived from quite unknown persons in the country numbered many hundreds. Shouts of banzai were heard everywhere in the streets as though the Brazilians themselves and not the Japanese had been the victors. Such excitement, Mr. Horiguchi says, he had never witnessed anywhere before. In order to perpetuate the memory of our success, says Mr. Horiguchi, they named their fastest boats Tōgō and some of their big thoroughfares Japanese roads. Mr. Horiguchi says that during his seven years' residence in Brazil he enjoyed perfect health. The heat is not oppressive nor excessive. The thermometer stands at about 85° in the day time and at night there is usually a cool breeze.

* According to the Novoe Vremya, after the outbreak of the war, twenty thousand officers and 1,270,000 soldiers were sent to Manchuria. After the restoration of peace, the number was reduced to 12,500 officers and 917,000 soldiers. The losses may thus be inferred to be 7,500 officers and 353,000 soldiers. The Russian paper adds that the army stationed at the front before the outbreak of the war is not included and that consequently the real losses must have been greater.

The investigations as to the services of officers and men of the Navy who participated in the late war have been already concluded. The publication of the result is being held back for the completion of a similar record for the Army. Owing to greater number of the officers and men and to the extent of the battlefields, the investigations with regard to the land forces will be more difficult than in the case of the Navy. The Hochi says that the Commanders of various armies and the commander of the United Squadron will be rewarded with the First Class of the Golden Kite; Commanders of all Divisions and of various squadrons, with the Second Class of the Golden Kite; and Commanders of all Brigades with the Third Class of the same order. Field-Marshal Marquis Yamagata and Oyama, who possess the Grand Cordon of the Chrysanthemum, will be rewarded in a special manner. The Yiji, commenting on the delay in the publication of the investigations, advises the naval and military authorities to announce publicly day by day the results arrived at by the committee. It adds that it is part of the responsibility of the Government and is also the earnest wish of the public that rewards to the officers and men who rendered such excellent services to the country at a critical time should be promptly bestowed.

It is added that the number of Japanese houses was 64,024. These figures show an increase of 3,098 over those estimated at the beginning of the year, with an increase of 6,822 in population.

An official telegram received at the Foreign Office says that Mr. I Motono, Japanese Ambassador to St. Petersburg, has arrived in the Russian capital. When he reached the Russian frontier he found that the Russian Government had provided a special train for his accommodation and His Excellency was given a very cordial welcome.

A Bill now before the Diet, known as the Gunsei Haishi Horitsuan, has for object the abolition of District Local Assemblies (Gun-kai) and the district control of villages and hamlets. It is calculated that several millions a year will be saved by this simplification of local administrative machinery. District offices and their heads came into existence in Japan in the year 1878, that is, a law was then enacted providing for this form of local government, though their actual establishment came about some years later. The Tokyo Keizai Zasshi gives an account of the expense of maintaining these offices during the 34th and 35th years of Meiji. In the first of the years the total cost was 4,964,337 yen; in the second 5,103,866 yen. In his replies to members of the Diet, Mr. Hara, the Home Minister, a few days ago made it plain that the buildings known as District Offices will still be retained for registering and other purposes, but the staff employed will be reduced and the power hitherto wielded by District assemblies will henceforth be exercised by Prefectural, Town, Village or Ward (Kumiai) Offices. The redistribution of power made necessary by the proposed change will be very considerable. The Bill seems to be meeting with a good deal of support, but Mr. Shimada Saburo and other Members of the Lower House think the Bill does not go far enough. It ought, they say, to abolish the District offices and the heads of these offices along with District government. The work to be done by these officers might more economically be done in the above-mentioned local offices.

It is interesting to observe from the returns compiled by Lloyd's Register that Germany provided the largest amount of work from abroad for British mercantile shipbuilders last year, her orders amounting to fifteen vessels of 85,020 tons (nearly 5½ per cent. of the total output). Next came Norway, with 50,655 tons. The British Colonies occupied the next place with 38,082 tons, and were closely followed by Austria-Hungary (33,623 tons). Sweden (33,097 tons), and Holland (32,761 tons). The percentage of the total output built for registration in the United Kingdom was nearly 78.5, equivalent to 1,273,731 tons. The foreign and colonial orders amounted to 21½ per cent. of the total output. Among foreign countries the three leading places in shipbuilding were held by the United States (303,000 tons), Germany (255,000 tons), and France (73,000 tons). In keeping with expectation, the turbine method of propulsion is being more largely employed. During last year seven vessels fitted with steam turbines were launched in England. In addition to the two large express steamers for the Cunard Company, there are at present under construction in the United Kingdom ten vessels of about 21,400 tons which are to be fitted with steam turbines. The returns for the year under review include 22 vessels of the turret-deck type; 131 steam trawlers (one of which, the largest yet built, is of 363 tons) and other fishing vessels; 30 dredgers, barges, &c.; 30 tugs; 15 yachts; and other vessels designed for special service. Besides these, 45 vessels, varying in tonnage from 100 tons to 1,320 tons, and principally intended for river and harbour purposes, have been built in the United Kingdom and taken to pieces for shipment abroad.

In connexion with the delay in the repayment of the house-tax to foreigners in accordance with the decision of the Hague Court of Arbitration, complaints have been presented to the Yokohama City Office by various foreigners. It is also said that payment of the Income-tax is withheld by some foreigners in consequence of which the City authorities are seriously embarrassed. It is remarked by the Asahi that the Kobe Municipality repaid the house tax to foreigners some time ago.

At 10 a.m. on March 13th, the official funeral services of the First Division took place at Aoyama Cemetery, Tokyo. The families of officers and men belonging to the division who died in the war were present as also were Ministers of State, high officers of the army, etc. The members of the Tokyo branch of the Ladies' Patriotic Society, under Marchioness Oyama, the consort of Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, attended to the guests, and the rites were successfully carried out. After the ceremonies, the guests were entertained with refreshments and various performances.

By the death in New Jersey of Mrs. Hepburn, wife of the venerable Dr. J. C. Hepburn, one of the oldest links with the past is severed. She knew Japan before the Restoration and her first home here was a temple at Kanagawa. Her saintly memory is cherished by many hundreds of people in this empire and widespread is the sympathy which flows out to her beloved husband, himself a nonagenarian, in his hour of sorrow.

Japanese papers publish from day to day lengthy reports of the Trial of Mr. Kono Hironaka and his associates. The proceedings have been somewhat sensational throughout. There has been a good deal of prevarication carried on, and considerable difficulty has been found in tracing the falsehoods to their real source. On the 9th in trying to prove that Mr. Kono gave directions for the destruction of the Hibiya Gate an attempt was made to identify him by means of the dress he wore on that occasion. But the evidence on this point was most conflicting; some asserting that he was dressed in native costume and others alleging that he had foreign dress and donned a high white hat. One fact has come out very clearly and that is the contradictoriness of the evidence elicited at the Preliminary Court of Inquiry and that furnished to the Court now sitting.

We learn from Tokyo papers that His Majesty the Tsar intends to send one of the Imperial Grand Dukes to Japan with a view to bringing about a closer friendship between the two countries. The Imperial messenger will be accompanied by high military and naval officers, and other officials. In return, His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will send to Russia a Prince of the Blood with an escort of high officers and officials. The date for the exchange of these courtesies is not yet certain.

Dr. G. E. Morrison, the well-known correspondent of The Times at Peking, left London in the latter part of January for Paris, where he made a short stay, and subsequently paid visits to the Straits Settlements and Siam on his way back to his post at Peking. It is no secret, says an English exchange, that he could have gone to another appointment on The Times's staff, but all interested in the Far East will be pleased that he is returning to a post he has made so peculiarly his own. Dr. Morrison, during his stay at home, made extensive purchases for his library of works on China, which now reaches several thousand volumes, and must be one of the most complete private collections on this subject.

His Royal Highness Prince Arthur has kindly consented to be patron of the movement for the erection of a monument to the memory of Will Adams at Hemmi, near Yokosuka, the promoters being Governor Sufu, Admiral Baron Inouye, Sir Claude MacDonald and Mr. James Walter.

Here is the version of the Uyeno concert fiasco as circulated through the East by Reuter:—

An extraordinary hoax was perpetrated at Tokio. Whilst the Prince of Connaught was attending a concert on Saturday, a rumour was spread by pseudo experts, of an impending disaster by tidal wave and earthquakes.

The concert was stopped, and the city was panic stricken till the next morning.

It is believed that the affair was the work of burglars.

The price of Japanese bonds in London, New York and Berlin is reported by telegrams received at the Foreign Office to have greatly appreciated. According to a trustworthy source, says the Hochi, French capitalists have begun to purchase Japanese bonds since apprehensions as to the Morocco Conference have passed away. The present rise in price is attributed principally to that fact. The same paper adds that in financial matters France is coming into close relations with Japan, which practically amounts to an alliance, and welcomes this development in the interest of general peace.

The budget for Tokyo City this year which has been submitted to the Municipal Assembly is as follows:—

Certain sums are also set aside for expenses of meetings, etc.

IMPERIAL DIET.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The house met at 1 p.m. on March 8th.

Previous to the discussion on the Order of the Day, Messrs. Hoshimatsu and Sasoku made speeches as to sanitary work connected with the army, etc. After a slight debate on the addresses, the programme of the day was brought in. The revision of the Salt Monopoly Law was passed through its three readings. The two revisions regarding the City Organization Law and the Street and Village Organization Law were sent to special committees; after a brief explanation by Mr. Hara, Minister for Home Affairs. A private bill regarding the Tokyo City Organization was introduced. Mr. R. Koidzuka delivered a speech on the proposal. He said that Marquis Ito had submitted a similar bill to the Diet with the view of converting the city into a metropolis. The intention was welcomed by the public. The bill, however, was not adopted at that time in the Diet. This bill was also handed to a special Committee. A private bill regarding the revision of the Pawnbrokers Regulations, etc., was then introduced. Some of its clauses were dismissed without discussion and some submitted to a special committee.

At 2.30 p.m., the House rose.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

At 10 a.m. on March 9th, the House of Peers met. The order of the day was as follows:

A report of the petitions committee; the continued first readings of the Government bills regarding the final account of the extraordinary expenditures needed in the war; the revision of the Coinage Law; affairs to be dealt with by the Resident-General in Korea; the first reading of private bills regarding the revision of the Government Account Law, etc.; and the investigation of various petitions.

The House passed the Bill regarding the concluding portion of War expenditure relating to the Army and Navy, and a Bill relating to the authority of the Resident-General in Korea, both of which had been sent up from the Lower House.

The House also adopted a petition relating to the pollution of rivers by the Ashio Copper Mine, and having referred several Bills to special committees rose at 11.25 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1 p.m. on March 10th. The Order of the Day was as follows:

1.—First reading of a Government bill regarding the Habutye Bleaching Law (sent down from the House of Peers).

2.—First reading of a Government bill regarding judicial administration in Korea.

3.—11—First reading of private bills regarding revision of Court organization, etc.

12—16—Various petitions and private proposals.

The first two bills were submitted to special committees after remarks by the Ministers for Agriculture and Commerce and for Justice. The two private bills regarding revision of the Court Organization Law and of the Law for Barristers were rejected. The private projects to amend an article of the Diet Law and to establish an institute for instruction in dyeing and weaving were passed, after which various other bills and petitions were handed to special committees. The House rose at 4.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10 a.m. on March 13th. The Government bill relating to an amendment of the Salt Monopoly Law was first brought up. Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, gave an explanation to the questions put by Barons Ishiguro and Tanaka, after which the bill was handed to a special committee. The request for post facto consent to Imperial Decree No. 194, proclaimed in 1900 was passed through all three readings. The bill regarding the abolition of the tax on Exchequer Bill dealt with on the Exchanges was also passed. When the bill regarding the revision of the Conscription Law was brought up, Mr. Izawa said that the law must be enforced on residents in Europe and America, and not only on those in China and Korea. He asked the house to reject the bill. General Terauchi, Minister for War, replied to the objection, after which the Bill was passed. The bill regarding a revision of the Coinage Law led Baron Kikuchi to introduce an amendment which was accepted and the bill was at once passed. The bill regarding the revision of the Court organization also passed on the favourable report of the Chairman of the special committee. The House rose at 11.30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1 p.m. The Government bill regarding services in connexion with the Residency-General in Korea was handed to a special Committee after a brief explanation by the Government delegate. The bill regarding the establishment of an asylum for the soldiers and bluejackets crippled in the war was passed without discussion. Six requests for post facto consent with regard to special payments during the war were all passed without discussion. The private bills regarding the establishment of a bank to facilitate trade between Japan and Korea, the adoption of the two years' system for conscripts, etc., were rejected. At 4.30 p.m., the House rose.

A GREAT SCHOOLMASTER.

ARNOLD of Rugby, TRING of Uppingham, and ALMOND of Loretto are the three high peaks predominating the world of English public-school life during the nineteenth century. Each man played his part nobly and each has received a fitting monument, over and above the memories of the lads whom they influenced, in biographies which take rank among the most interesting and inspiring works of their kind in English letters. Of the three ALMOND is perhaps the least known, for his school was by far the smallest, never even in its most prosperous days counting more than 140 scholars. Then again the school was placed in an out-of-the-way corner of the world, at Musselburgh, a rough, grey, untidy fishing village a few miles out of Edinburgh. In the olden days it was the site of a shrine of Our Lady of Loretto, the patroness, by the way, of those hoary seats of learning, Winchester and Eton. A small school was opened there in 1829, but ALMOND did not make acquaintance with the place until 1857, when he entered as mathematical master. He had been born in Glasgow, which a writer in the Spectator so aptly describes as the "mixing vat of Highland and Lowland, Celt and Saxon," and ALMOND was a mixture of them all. After a brilliant career at Balliol he returned to Scotland and at once took up his life's career. It may interest some Yokohama folk to know that for four years he was second master at Merchiston College, Edinburgh, and he returned straight from Merchiston, in 1862, to become proprietor and "Head" of Loretto. Already men had begun to speak of him as an uncommon personality, a pioneer in his profession. His residence at Oxford had attracted him greatly to all things Greek and it was but natural that in drawing up his plans he put health as the first of human possessions, while he held that Greek literature was the inspirer of the nobler intellectual qualities. Very soon the Loretto boy had developed into a type by himself. It was a regulation that much of the school day should be spent in the open air. Nobody was allowed to be indoors from 2.30 till 4 p.m., and those not engaged in playing football, cricket, golf, fives, hockey or other games had to substitute a good five-mile walk. Half a mile—called in Loretto phrase "a links"—was the rule for every pupil before breakfast time. Mr. MACKIE, writing to the Scottish Field the other day, said:—

The most striking feature of the school regulations relates to dress. This is a speciality, and is worthy of serious attention. Every pupil wears flannel, summer and winter; blue in winter as being warmer, white in summer. In hot weather the boys take off their coats and do their work or take their meals in their shirt-sleeves. Caps are seldom worn except during bright sun, as a protection. On the wettest day every boy must take as his minimum of exercise a "Wallyford," as it is called, of 3½ miles. Tight collars, tight trousers are taboo. Open necks are insisted on and all mufflers are banished to the bottom of the travelling trunk. Open windows are the rule, and if in spite of this device the temperature of a room reaches codeg, or over, "coats off" is the word. Corporal punishment—that good, old-fashioned mode of correction—now in abeyance in ordinary schools, is here preferred to

"lines" and detentions, and other more up-to-date methods of punishment. The boys themselves are made responsible for the smooth and efficient working of the educational machine. Hence every side has its head boy. Boys are put in charge of all sorts of things; museum, library, drying-room, fives court, &c., are all under the charge of particular boys. Every form has its window-opener, its ball-keeper, and so forth. It is worth noting that the prefects are chosen not for brilliant parts or eminence in learning, but for their character, their efficiency, reliability, and faithfulness in the discharge of their duties.

A reviewer in The Times of Mr. MACKENZIE's biography of his old chief declares that nobody but ALMOND could have carried out ALMOND's ideas, and quotes some passages as an illustration of the source of "The Head's" influence over his lads:—

His method was strangely individual, and humorously characteristic at once of himself and of the school. The intellectual life of thoughtful boys at Loretto was always extraordinarily keen. Not a measure in politics or a scheme of philanthropy, not a theory of morals or a method in sport, but had its echoes in the endless discussions of our happy family. But, for the main body of the school, it was the practical proposals of our chief that introduced the disquieting element.

One never knew at what time the new notion might make its first appearance. . . . More often it was at tea in the private dining room that the new idea would pop out perplexing the old lady with fears of change, and encountering, on all occasions, her gentle but despairing obstruction. ("My mother, you must know," the Head once explained to a visitor, "is the leader of the Opposition.") From the old lady's tea table the Head would himself carry it straightway to the head boy's room, where that great official would receive it with all the gravity which his responsibilities imposed upon him. . . .

At the end of a considerable list of the characters about the place who would mouth and taste the new notion, each in his peculiar manner, comes ARCHIE PARR, who—

Would make a sly allusion to it, as he handed the Head his heavy iron. The "Skipper" would dust his flute and laugh, and say it reminded him of something he had once seen in the China Seas. And meanwhile the prefects were debating it, the Fifth abusing it, the Middles "guying" it, the "Nippers" making songs of it, till the whole place seethed, and fizzed, and hummed about it, like a pot-a-boil, a champagne-bottle half uncorked, a hive of angry bees. But sooner or later all criticisms and objections and defiance had to pass the ordeal of the Head's own searching dialectic. . . . In plain speech, then, Almond usually convinced us of the feasibility of his plan. We tried it and found it answer. We took it into our everyday life. We made it part of the gathering traditions of the school. And when we had thus adopted it, we cared nothing for the opinion of the outside world. We were ready to maintain it against all and sundry with the fidelity of Mahomedan converts.

Such were the principles of Loretto. To sacrifice to the Moloch of authority in any form was ALMOND's first abhorrence. The object of education, he maintained, was to make men think. "Examinations, especially army examinations, small talk, standing drinks, pipe-clay and tight uniforms, the imitative idolatry of the Hebrews, the routine of the Pharisees, were hateful to him, because they produced or issued from weakness or thoughtlessness or hypocrisy. He attacked them all in school, in the pulpit, in the press, because he tracked out the abhorrent attribute in them all." He himself compared Loretto to Sparta: with no decorative buildings, nothing to strike or charm the eye; yet it was a home and a nurse of which he was not ashamed, a school capable of producing a healthy, dominant, and even heroic type. But the last thing that ALMOND wished to produce was an ascetic. Loretto was to be and is "a community visibly living according to the dictates of science or right reason." It is odd, but it is characteristic, remarks his biographer, that he should say: "Keble seems to me to take the right side in a more important controversy than any theological one,—viz., the side of simple and Christian living against fine linen and sumptuous living." And again: "Next to being where I am, I'd like to have been Warden of Keble. What a fight against all the demons of convention and prejudice one would have had! And fighting for an ideal is the great happiness of life." As it chanced, one of his earliest pupils and truest friends, to whom he wrote his last dying letter, was Bishop MYLNE, one of the first Tutors of Keble.

ALMOND's niche in the Temple of Fame is well secured, and the heritage that he has bequeathed is one of the glories of modern Scotland. "The Loretto boy, coatless, capless, may be met with anywhere in Scotland now," writes Mr. MACKENZIE in a picturesque passage. "You may find him dangling from a rope on the sunny side of the Bass Rock, photographing or looking for eggs. You may meet him free-wheeling—red coat on handlebars—down the long slope that leads from Comrie to Loch Earn. You may observe him hauling at a scringe-net on the coast of Mull; or plying a fishing-rod or a geological hammer among the primeval hills and innumerable lochs of Sutherland. In all these situations he and his comfortable undress have long ceased to attract attention. The public has grown used to them, and for the very good reason that the public has adopted them." ALMOND's heretical optimism was always buoyed by the thought of himself as the agent of a national regeneration. "It is by proving to boys in the concrete," he wrote to Mr. MACKENZIE, "the successfulness of minor and well-judged results, that you embolden them to play their part in what I believe will be the next great revolution—viz., the transference of the empire of our daily life from custom to reason." ALMOND has passed to "where beyond these voices there is peace," but his works and influence remain as his enduring monument, and his motto will spur on many a boy to a nobler conception of life and its duties—"Spartam nactus es, hanc exorna!"

NATIONAL SERVICE.

EARL ROBERTS, the veteran Field Marshal of the British Army, who resigned his position on the Imperial Defence Committee in order to bring home to the British nation the imperative necessity for bringing within reach of every able-bodied man some form of military training, is not letting the grass grow beneath his feet. He is addressing crowded and enthusiastic meetings in various parts of the country and the home papers are giving him every encouragement by reporting his speeches at length. Speaking at Manchester his Lordship combatted the notion that his proposals practically amounted to conscription. He was always and altoget-ther, he said, opposed to conscription as not being applicable to the army of Great Britain. "Surely," he urged, "there was all the difference in the world between a nation every man of which was obliged to serve in the ranks of the regular army and perform, while in those ranks, all the onerous duties of a regular soldier during times of peace and for small wars, as is the case on the Continent, and a nation which, while maintaining a regular army for foreign service, asked every man to undergo such a training as would fit him to take a useful part in a great national emergency when every true Briton would certainly volunteer and only the shirkers, the unpatriotic, and the disloyal would be content to remain passive." At Liverpool Lord ROBERTS reiterated the statement he made last year in the House of Lords that the British armed forces as a body were as absolutely unprepared and unfitted for war as they were in 1899; but he now substituted the words "the nation" for "armed forces as a body," because he had no wish to suggest that the practical lessons of the South African war had not been taken to heart by the Regular Army. "If war were to come upon us in Europe or on the Indian frontier, as it inevitably would if we were not prepared, we should have to deal with very different foes from the Boers. It might be said that we have an alliance and we have our Fleet. He welcomed the Japanese alliance with the greatest enthusiasm, but it was only for ten years, and it applied only to Asia and not to Europe, where our danger was far greater. The European status quo must be maintained without an army, which at present we had not got." After pointing out the risk that British naval supremacy might not be maintained, Lord ROBERTS proceeded to contend that without any adequate and efficient citizen army British shores and homes were not safe. He insisted on the necessity of being able to devote 500,000 men to the defence of India, and as many more for participation in a European struggle.

Lord ROBERTS has found a hearty supporter in the great surgeon, Sir FREDERICK TREVES, and we reproduce part of a speech delivered by him at Manchester in which he discussed the effect of the National Service League upon the national health. Sir FREDERICK said:—

A recently published report on the question of physical degeneration in this country, conveyed serious warnings, and those warnings should be acted upon. Individuals paid great attention to health; few people present, he supposed, were not at that moment on a diet (laughter), few were not using some lozenge or tablet. (Renewed laughter.) There was reason for this, for robust health was necessary to success in life. The nervous system was rebelling as the outcome of what was called our modern life, the rush and the wear and tear of it. (Cheers.) This was the effect of the introduction of steam, electricity, the telegraph and telephone, the motor, the week-end (laughter), and the attempt so many people made, and made with some success, to live three lives in one. The result, as every physician would tell, was that nervous diseases were developing, and if this condition was going to develop without limit the time was not very far distant when the consequences would be at least inconvenient. There was no disguising the fact that the best remedy for such a condition was perfect physical health such as could only be obtained from open-air exercise. (Cheers.) No language could express the value of our national games, and they should be encouraged in every possible way; but we were beginning to play games vicariously. Many thousands of young men spent their Saturday afternoons watching football; they did not play it. (Cheers.) Moreover, outdoor work was not so common in the country as it once was. In workshops, too, machines were taking the place of muscles. As a remedy he could imagine no better system than a military training. Physical perfection could not be tested by a tape placed round muscles. That form of training was not everything. Military training provided other necessary development; it gave promptness, alertness, capacity to act in company (by no means easy to acquire), and, above all, it gave wholesome appreciation of the value of discipline. (Cheers.) The National Service League had a very worthy intent, even if it should do no more than serve to keep green the memory of the heroic traditions of the country and to keep alight the lamp of patriotism which had ever been the glory of England. (Cheers.)

All well-wishers of the old country must desire success to crown the labours of Lord ROBERTS. But there can be no doubt that the fine emotional fervour which informed the Volunteer movement for so many years has spent its force, first, because it is the tendency of all such movements to become stale in the lapse of years, and secondly by reason of the attitude assumed by the authorities at the War Office towards what they dub amateur soldiering. Then again the increasing tendency of the age towards ease and comfort militates against the sacrifices which must necessarily be made by men who undergo even voluntarily training in military exercises without some pressing national need to inspire them. The hardihood of the race is at stake, but will that brace the nation to shoulder its responsibilities in the way Lord ROBERTS desires? The state of public feeling at home at the present moment resembles very dangerously the condition of the Roman body politic when that great empire was entering upon its decline.

THE FAMINE.

DR. MUNRO'S PAPER BEFORE THE ASIATIC SOCIETY.

At the meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan, held on Thursday, March 8th, at the residence of Dr. N. Gordon Munro, 91, Bluff, Mr. John Carey Hall presided over an attendance of about thirty ladies and gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the meeting, said it would be a work of supererogation on his part to attempt to introduce to a Yokohama audience a gentleman of such established reputation as Dr. Munro. He was pleased to see such a large number present that evening, which showed that the decision of the Society to hold some of its meetings in Yokohama was appreciated by the public. For this change they were indebted to Dr. Dearing. He (the Chairman) thought the attendance that evening would encourage the Society to repeat the experiment, instead of always holding the meetings in Tokyo.

Dr. MUNRO then read his paper which has already been in part published in these columns.

At the conclusion of the paper Dr. Munro was warmly applauded. Questions and discussion were then invited, but none being forthcoming.

The CHAIRMAN said it might seem ungracious after listening to the exhaustive paper read by Dr. Munro to suggest that there were any omissions, but certainly one had occurred to him. Dr. Munro in enumerating the investigators in the field of research had given a complete list as far as foreigners were concerned, but the name occurred to him of a Japanese who had played a prominent part in the work, namely Mr. Kanda Kohei, who in 1870 was Governor of Hyogo Ken. Mr. Kanda in 1884 published a work on the Stone Age of Japan, and this was translated by his son, Baron Kanda Naibu, at present Professor in the Peers' School. This work was illustrated by twenty four plates giving a complete list of the stone implements, and in a prefatory note it was stated that for one hundred years before he wrote Japanese investigators had been giving attention to the Stone Age.

Dr. MUNRO was glad Mr. Hall had supplied the omission. Mr. Kanda certainly had a most complete collection of implements connected with the Stone Age, and he considered that gentleman deserved great credit for his contributions.

Dr. DEARING proposed a very hearty vote of thanks to Dr. Munro for his most interesting lecture and for his hospitality to the members of the Association that evening.

The CHAIRMAN, in supporting the motion, said he was sure the meeting would willingly support the vote of thanks to Dr. Munro for his able, instructive, and interesting paper. He (the Chairman) congratulated the members on the good attendance that evening, and hoped the meeting would prove the precursor of many similar gatherings. The good attendance would, he hoped, encourage the Society to hold other meetings in Yokohama, and at the same time would afford gratification to Dr. Munro and in some way compensate him for the time, labour, and expense expended in this research and in the preparation of the interesting lecture to which they had listened with so much pleasure. (Applause.)

Dr. MUNRO briefly acknowledged the vote, and the members then spent some time in examining interesting collection of implements, etc., placed on view by the lecturer.

YOKOHAMA SPECIE BANK.

The fifty-second semi-annual meeting of the Yokohama Specie Bank was held at 2.30 p.m. on March 10th. A hundred and thirty-nine shareholders, Mr. Yoshida, an official of the Imperial Household, and Mr. Nagahama, an official of the Department of Finance, were present. Mr. Soma, President of the bank, took the chair and made a speech regarding business in the last half of 1903. The resignation of Mr. Misaki Kamenosuke, one of the directors was announced, after which Mr. Takahashi Korekiyo, Vice President of the Bank of Japan, and Mr. Odagiri Masunosuke, ex-Consul-General in Shanghai, were elected to the Board of Directors. The proposal for providing branches at Osaka, Dairen and Mukden was introduced and the shareholders gave their consent to it. Finally, the accounts for the last half year were submitted as follows: Net profits yen 3,418,115.34. From this amount, the following appropriations were made:

	yen.
Ordinary Reserve .....	360,000.00
Special Reserve .....	1,000,000.00
Silver reserve .....	200,000.00
Dividend (at the rate of 12 per cent per annum, or yen 6 per share on old, new, and second shares; and yen 3 on third shares .....	1,080,000.00

The remainder was carried forward to next account.

Mr. Soma has resigned the Presidency of the Yokohama Specie Bank on account of ill-health, and Mr. Takahashi, Vice-President of the Bank of Japan, who was elected one of the directors at the half yearly meeting, was appointed to the vacancy.

Speaking at the last meeting of shareholders Mr. Soma, President of the Yokohama Specie Bank said:—Gentlemen.—This is our forty-second semi-annual meeting and I have pleasure in submitting to you the accounts for the last half-year, and to summarize the domestic and foreign financial conditions and our business proceedings during that period.

Being affected by the war, no special demand appeared among financial circles during the last half year as there was no appearance of new industries, still owing to the withdrawal of the Manchurian armies, the reparations of military necessities, etc., a large amount was paid out by the public. Naturally money in circulation was rather abundant. The Bank of Japan, consequently, at the end of December raised the rate of interest. The instalment payments on Exchequer bonds and the continuance of the war tax did not cause any special embarrassment in economical circles. The condition of the money market was also favourable. The conclusion of the peace treaty, however, created some anxiety among the public, and further as the result of unfavourable weather, the crop of rice, which has a close bearing on financial circles, was remarkably reduced. The famine in the north-eastern provinces, where serious distress had not hitherto been experienced, is still prevalent. These phenomena led to inactivity in the industrial and commercial world. In spite of the dormant state of domestic trade, confidence in the Japanese financial basis was entertained and increased abroad as the effect of the victories in the late war. Gradually the price of our Government loan bonds advanced and  $4\frac{1}{2}$ -per cent. bonds amounting to thirty million sterling were successfully floated in Great Britain, America and Germany. Subsequently a further loan of twenty-five millions sterling and another of fifty millions sterling bearing 4-per cent. interest were also accepted in foreign countries with similar enthusiasm. Also, the negotiations of our private companies with a foreign syndicate for a loan were carried out successfully and a large sum of Exchequer Bonds and other valuable documents was purchased by foreign capitalists. Consequently the supply of money was increased so that the circulation at the end of last year was very easy. Reviewing the foreign trade, it appears that the export of cotton yarn and cotton woven goods to China, especially to Manchuria, was considerably increased on account of the addition to the incomes of the natives through the war. The export of raw silk was not favourable as the price at home was higher than that prevailing in America and France. The habutaye business was in a similar state. The tea trade was also inactive owing to the abundant stocks in foreign markets but Formosan tea was successfully exported. The business conditions in Japanese principal staples were generally unfavorable and consequently the export of the last half year only amounted to yen 178,760,000 in round numbers. These figures show a decrease of yen 3,020,000 compared with the export of the last half year, the whole totalling yen 181,790,000. During the same period, imports increased consequent upon the restoration of peace. The import of military stores continued even after the peace treaty, but the amount gradually decreased. The imports amounted to yen 202,070,000, the figures showing an increase of 12,340,000 over those of the previous half year. Such an increase was, of course, unavoidable in war time. During the whole year the export of gold and silver exceeded the import by yen 15,100,000. The Bank of Japan, however, maintained its specie reserve over a hundred million yen, strengthening the basis of the convertible note issue. The specie reserve, it may be said, was kept up largely by means of the benefits derived from foreign loans.

The economical state of foreign countries has to be reviewed here. Owing to the export of specie to France, America, Egypt, etc., the money market of Great Britain became very steady. The Bank of England raised its interest rate from  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to 3 per cent. at the beginning of September, and again raised it to 4 per cent. at the end of the same month. The discount on drafts in the market went up from  $1\frac{1}{4}$  to 4 per cent. during the same month. However, foreign trade was in a brisk condition, and commercial and industrial enterprises developed favourably. In America, all matters of agriculture were productive, with the exception of cotton, and therefore commercial business attained a scale much larger than in the first half year. In France because of the extraordinary fall in the price of Russian bonds, a panic at one time took place. After the restoration of peace between Japan and Russia, a more easy feeling was entertained in the share markets and subsequently prices went up. The Morocco affair caused an uneasy feeling in financial circles in Germany, but calls for no special remark. In Manchuria order was not restored in business circles after the Japan-Russia war. The money spent by both armies in the country gave the natives unexpected gains, and increased their purchasing powers. Generally the trade between Japan and China has become active. The Indian trade became brisker than during the corresponding period of the previous year on account of good crops. Despite the ill-balanced proportion of Japanese exports and imports, unexpected fluctuations of exchange with Europe and America, and the rise in the price of silver from 27 pence to  $30\frac{1}{4}$  pence, which frequently caused much inconvenience, the business of the bank progressed favourably. The net income was yen 3,310,000 in round numbers, including the balance, yen 609,000, brought from the previous account. The details are shown in the accounts. The receipts were increased by yen 565,400,000, or 11 per cent. over those of the previous account, and the disbursements by yen 563,900,000, or 11 per cent. In exchange business, sales were increased by yen 38,800,000, or 12.8 per cent., and purchases by yen 66,000,000, or 14.2 per cent. Debits to the bank was increased by yen 7,950,000 and credits to the bank by yen 8,900,000. Besides, affairs conducted on behalf of the Government and the Bank of Japan also were greatly increased. The post bellum undertakings naturally found the bank ready to assist as agent at Dairen, Port Arthur, Mukden, Tieling and Chefoo, and offices have been opened in these places. These offices are at present attending to affairs in connection with the central treasury and accordingly do not deal with ordinary mercantile business. The withdrawal of the troops will shortly be completed, and the general condition of Manchuria will approximate to that necessary for peaceful development. Naturally banking business is expected to share in the revival of trade. Instructions to this end were given accordingly to our Bank at the end of last year by the Ministers for Finance and Foreign Affairs. The essential points of these instructions were that the business of the bank should be to foster the interests of Manchuria while acting as the central organ of commercial circles; to lead in the financial development and the growth of trade between Japan and China; to issue drafts payable at sight which are to supersede war-notes; to provide a special reserve for strengthening the business basis in Manchuria; and in order to superintend the branches and agents' offices, to provide a chief office there with one of the directors or a representative fully authorized to deal with matters on the spot. Under the foregoing instructions, the Bank decided to make efforts to extend its business in that region. This enterprise is now being put into force. As the first step, the bank intends to provide branches at Osaka, Dairen and Mukden; to increase the number of its employees; and to provide a special reserve for Manchurian business. For this purpose the bank asks you to pay up the half of the unpaid share capital still outstanding on the third new shares, viz., three million yen. This being the intention of the bank regarding Manchurian business, I earnestly desire your consent and co-operation.

LADIES INTERNATIONAL READING-ROOM.

At the attractive rooms belonging to the Ladies International Reading-Room, 179 Bluff, another of the delightful Social Teas which were instituted a few years ago, was given by the Directors to the subscribers and their friends on Wednesday afternoon from four to six. A large number of ladies availed themselves of the invitation, and the afternoon was most pleasantly spent in listening to some charming recitations by Miss Vera Irwine and Mr. Stephens, and in the usual chat of the tea-table. The hostesses were Mrs. Merriman, Mrs. Edwards, Mrs. Dearing, Mrs. Booth, Mrs. F. J. Moss, Mrs. MacArthur, Mrs. Post, Mrs. Walter Austin, and Miss Lloyd Thomas. Mrs. Merriman took occasion to tell the guests that the Reading Room was greatly in need of new subscribers to make it self-supporting, and indeed to keep it alive, and the subscribers present were urged to enlist as many new members as possible before the end of the fiscal year, September 30th. The Reading-Room and Library combined has been a boon to the community for a decade and more; and there should be a strong effort made to keep it up, and make it a permanency in the city.

INTERPORT FOOTBALL.

The annual interport football match under Association rules came off on Saturday at Kobe in favourable weather and resulted in a win for Yokohama by one goal to nil. There was a very large crowd of spectators present. The visitors scored their point in the first half, Stoddart Clarke kicking the goal, and it looked very much as if Kobe would equalise for on change of ends the home eleven pressed very hard and seemed almost on the point of scoring time and again. Play was, in fact, very even, fast, and good, and neither side were able to claim superiority in passing or attacking. The teams were:—

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF JAPAN.

By kind invitation of the British Ambassador, a general meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan was held at the British Embassy at four o'clock in the afternoon of Wednesday, February 14th. H. E. Sir Claude MacDonald, President of the Society, said that the minutes of the last meeting had been already published and might be accepted without reading them. As there was no other business before the meeting, he at once introduced the lecturer, H.B.M.'s Consul-General, Mr. John Carey Hall, whose subject was "Japanese Feudal Origins: The Hojo Code of Judicature." The paper was too long to read as a whole, hence Mr. Hall gave a fascinating epitome, with historical explanation, to show the origin, nature and purposes of the Hojo Code, and with aptly chosen extracts for illustration.

Mr. Hall said:—

In laying before the Society, as a small contribution towards our clearer understanding of Japanese medieval social conditions, a translation of the Magisterial Code of the Hojo Power-holders, it seemed desirable that it should be prefaced by a short statement of the position which this enactment occupied in the historical field of Japan's legislative development and of the circumstances under which it was enacted. To this might be added a brief analysis of its contents and a word or two as to the bibliography of the subject.

The whole of the Statute law of old Japan, including both the theocratic and the feudal periods, from the consolidation of the state in the seventh century of our era to near the close of the Tokugawa period in the nineteenth, has been comprised in one octavo volume of less than a thousand pages, entitled Nihon Kodai Hoken, the Ancient Statute Laws of Japan, edited by Mr. Hagino and three collaborators.

Of this book, two-fifths of the bulk holds all the legislation of the theocratic or Imperial period, extending from the seventh to near the end of the twelfth century: whilst the laws of the feudal period, from the beginning of the thirteenth to the end of the sixteenth century, fill the remaining three-fifths. It thus appears that the six centuries of feudal regime were somewhat more prolific in legislation than the six centuries that preceded them. Now at the very beginning of feudal legislation stands this tiny Code of fifty-one articles, which was, if not promulgated at least propounded, by the third of the line of the Hojo Power-holders at Kamakura in the year-period of Joyei, (otherwise pronounced Teiyei), corresponding to A.D. 1232. It is therefore the earliest in time of the feudal enactments of Japan.

But it is something more than that. For an inspection of the subsequent legislation of the Ashikaga and Tokugawa lines of Shoguns shows that their statutes were based upon those of their predecessors in power, the Hojo Shikken. After its promulgation in 1232 this Code of Judicature not only continued in force for a century, but became the nucleus around which a series of supplementary enactments continued to grow. These accretions amounted in bulk to five or six times the size of the initial code. And when, after the overthrow of the Hojo sway in 1333, and a momentary restoration of the imperial rule, the second or Ashikaga line of Shoguns inaugurated its domination, its founder followed the example of the Hojo rulers in issuing a short Code, which, adopting the main results of the Hojo regime, was developed by later enactments into a body of law many times the size of its initial Shikimoku, or Code, of the Kenmu year-period, A.D. 1335. When, after the abolition of the Ashikaga power, and the unifying work of Oda Nobunaga and the Taiko Hideyoshi, the Tokugawa line succeeded to the sway, at the close of the sixteenth century, their lawgivers had a developed feudal society to deal with, such as the legislation of the four previous centuries had helped to mould. The Hojo Code had reference only to the feudal lords who had followed the fortunes of the short-lived Minamoto line and its allies and successors the Hojo clan; but the Tokugawa rulers had one set of laws for the Kuge, or Court nobility, another for the Buke, or feudal Lords, and a third for the Bushi, or Samurai, their retainers. This extended scope of the Tokugawa power is historically traceable in large measure to the foundation laid by the magisterial institutions of the Hojo Shikken. It would therefore be hardly an exaggeration to say that this first essay in feudal codification put forth by the Kamakura government early in the thirteenth century is the taproot of the whole subsequent growth of Japanese feudal law.

So much for its historical position as a link in the chain of national legislation. We may now glance at the state of affairs that gave occasion for its being enacted.

It would be impossible to set forth, in these pre-factory remarks, the underlying economic causes which resulted in the establishment of a feudal constitution of society in Japan. All that can be attempted is to trace in rough outline the course of the feudal evolution as marked by prominent political events preceding the transfer of the seat of government from Kyoto to Kamakura towards the end of the twelfth century. Even this superficial retrospect requires to begin with a passing reference to the dawn of Japan's authentic history.

The loose, theocratic authority of the early Mikadoes underwent a great change by the introduction of Buddhism in the middle of the sixth century; and a further radical transformation in the middle of the seventh century by the wholesale adoption of Chinese political institutions closely imitated from the then recently established Imperialism of the resplendent Tang dynasty. An elaborate system of Court ranks and offices was introduced and also a new administrative machinery for the provinces, under which the chief duty of the local authorities consisted in the levying of the rice-tax and forwarding it to the Capital by means of the corvée, or labour-tax. These sweeping innovations, which took over half a century to effect, are compendiously known as the Reform of the Taikwa period, by far the most important movement in Japanese history previous to the Meiji restoration. A thoroughly competent sociological study of this event has been given to English readers in an excellent book entitled, "The Early Institutional Life of Japan," by a Mr. K. Asakawa, which was published last year by the Waseda University. Japanese scholars nowadays are generally agreed that this wholesale importation of Chinese political arrangements in the seventh century was either premature, or excessive, or both. Among its consequences in the centuries following was an increasing divergence of interests between the nobility of the Court and the great country families, who for various reasons were shut out from preferment at the Capital. Upon the latter devolved the task of winning by the strong hand from the Yamato aborigines on the Eastern and North-eastern frontiers the additional lands required by the increase of population of the Yamato conquerors. At first desultory and sporadic, this struggle for the land necessitated military organization, and the control of the army soon became an object of contention between two powerful families, the Taira and Minamoto, otherwise known as the Hei and the Gen. After their rivalry at court had continued for some generations there came an open rupture in the middle of the twelfth century. At first the Taira were successful, and all but extirpated the Minamoto clan. But after some twenty years of Taira domination, Minamoto no Yoritomo, at the behest of the Imperial family, raised the standard of revolt in the Kwanto, 1180, A.D., aided by the resources and influence of the powerful Hojo clan of Idzu, to which his wife, the lady Masa, belonged. After six years of warfare the Taira were crushed and exterminated. In 1184 Yoritomo chose Kamakura as the headquarters of his military administration. In 1192 the second rank of nobility and the office of Commander-in-chief was conferred on him, and around this nucleus most of the powers of sovereignty were soon concentrated.

It was now manifest to all men that the power of the State had passed from the hands of the Court at Kyoto to those of the Minamoto head of the Army; and men of intellect and ambition left the capital and took service under the new administration. Foremost amongst these was Oye no Hiromoto, ancestor of the feudal Lords of Sasuma; and when Yoritomo died in 1199 A.D., this statesman and the lady Masa directed by their wise counsels the course of affairs at periods of crisis for over a quarter of a century longer. The ambition of the Hojo family hastened the extinction of Yoritomo's posterity in 1219, and a puppet Commander-in-Chief, aged 2, of the Fujiwara clan, but a grandson of lady Masa, was brought down from Kyoto to Kamakura, the control of affairs remaining in the hands of Hojo Yoshitoki, Lady Masa's brother, with the modest but straightforward designation of Shikken, or Power-holder.

But the power of the State was not allowed to pass from the hands of one military family to those of another as if it were a matter of course. The Imperial Court made an effort to wrest back its sovereign rights by arraying the warriors of the West of Japan against those of the East. The struggle was short, sharp and decisive. It is known in history as the military disturbance of Shokui, A.D. 1221. It resulted in the banishment of two ex-Emperors and the reigning Emperor, the confiscation of the estates of their adherents and the strengthening and extension of the Hojo power. The foundations of that power had been laid when Hojo Tokimasa, as his son-in-law Yoritomo's representative at Kyoto, after the destruction of the Taira, induced the Emperor in A.D. 1186 to sanction the appointment by Yoritomo of Shogun, or Protectors, in each of the Provinces, of Jito, or Land-Reeves, in all the townships, and police in the villages, and the imposition of a tax of about a bushel of rice per acre to support this military administration alongside of the existing civil officials holding their appointments from the Emperor. These Protectors in the course of time supplanted the civil governors of provinces in much the same way as the Intendants appointed by Richelieu in the provinces of France usurped by degrees the power formerly exercised by the great feudatories.

We may now glance at the institutions through which the sway of the military chieftains at Kamakura was exercised. The Council of government, presided over by Ohoie no Hiromoto, at first bore the unpretentious designation of Kumonjo, or Place of Public Documents, but in a few years' time this was boldly replaced by the name Mandokoro, which is a contraction of Matsuri-dokoro, or Place of Government, a title which the Fujiwara Regents at Kyoto had not hesitated to bestow on their wives and mothers. After establishing the feudal relation with his followers and confirming the estates previously granted to or held by them, Yoritomo next established, under the name of Samurai-dokoro, or Place of Service, an office for the probation and selection of retainers of merit and talent, which had control of official appointments and promotions; and last but not least, he established an office called Monjusho, or Place of Enquiry and Comment, which was in essence a Court of Justice, dealing with disputes arising between the feudal retainers and with offences committed by them; the provincial governors being allowed to retain their normal jurisdiction over the rest of the people. For extending the control of the two central councils at Kamakura to the Samurai and clergy of the provinces, Bugyo, or Magistrates of various kinds, were appointed with powers to decide civil and criminal cases in first instance.

When Hojo Yasutoki, the third of his line, succeeded in 1225 to his father's position as Power-holder for the puppet Shogun, the society of the new military capital of Kamakura was in a state of not very stable equilibrium. No doubt the peasantry throughout the empire were content, for the taxes had been lightened. Formerly the farmer had to give up seven-tenths of the annual produce of his land in payment of taxes, imperial and provincial; the Hojo reduced the rate to one half. But the situation of the governing military class was not so settled as was that of the governed mass of the nation. Emancipated from the control of the Imperial Court and from the jurisdiction of its provincial governors, the warriors had as yet no law but the will of their feudal superiors. For the settlement of disputes amongst them and for the punishment of offences recourse had often to be made to force. It is told of the second Minamoto Shogun, Yoritomo, that when a dispute respecting boundaries was brought before him for adjudication he drew his pen through the middle of the plan, saying he had no time for enquiry into details; and that in future such disputes must be settled in the same way; if the parties were dissatisfied with that mode of adjudication let them not have disputes. Far different was the spirit in which Hojo Yasutoki exercised the power. The first fifteen days of every month were given up to judicature. He caused a bell to be hung at the gate of the Record Office, and when a suitor struck it his petition or complaint was at once attended to. Decisions were pronounced on the tenth, twentieth and thirtieth days of the month, important and difficult cases being first discussed at meetings of the Council of Government. It was after some years' experience of this judicial work and of the legislative needs of his time that he drew up his code of judicature.

It consists of fifty-one sections, or heads, of law, followed by a solemn institutory vow or Oath. The subjects dealt with may be briefly indicated as follows:—

Shrines and Worship; Temples and Services; Duties of Protectors; Oppression by Protectors; Defalcations of Land-Reeves; Judicature of Governors and Lords; Recent grants of fiefs confirmed; Claims to fiefs barred by prescription; Rebellious plots; Responsibility for homicide, etc.; Wife not responsible for husband's crime; Abusive language; Assaults; Principal's responsibility for Deputy; Forgery; Lands confiscated for the Shokui Disturbance; Fathers' and Sons' responsibility for Dito; Grants to daughters revocable; Ungrateful dependent kinsmen; Successors nominate predeceasing parents; Assignments to wives made before divorce; Disinheriting adult sons; Adoptions by women; Fiefs of widows who marry again; Kwanto vassals marrying into Noble families; Assignments revocable as between sons; Vacant fiefs; Slander; Champerty and maintenance; Tampering with judicature; Unsuccessful suitors reviling magistrates; Harboursing outlaws; Robbery, larceny and arson; Adultery; Contempt of Judicial Summons; Altering land-marks; Scheming for appointments from Nobles; Land-Reeves oppressing villeins' headmen; Kwanto the avenue for official promotion; Dito for clerical advancement; Slaves and miscellaneous persons; Molestation of migrating farmers; Land-grabbing;

Scrambling for fiefs; Punishing without investigating; Rights of incoming and retiring Governors; Commendation; Buying and selling fiefs; Summary adjudication; Accessories in brawls; Abuse of legal process; Institutory Oath; Council's Signatures.

A rough analysis shows that the Code begins with religion and ends with legal procedure. The latter matters dealt with being the political arrangements necessary for adjusting the new government de facto in the Kwanto to the old government de jure at the capital; the grants, confirmations, successions and distribution of the fiefs; and last but by no means least the crimes and offences which the members of the newly evolved warrior caste were most prone to commit. No attempt is made to legislate for the common folk. They were left in the fiefs, at the disposal of the feudal lords; and outside of these, to the normal jurisdiction of the provincial governors or of the Court nobles in whose multitudinous Manors they were virtually serfs.

Only a few points could be touched upon by way of comment. This code, like that of Justinian, began by giving religion the first place in the regulation of the State. The high position of women was next dwelt upon. Professor Chamberlain had some years ago pointed out that the position of women in the military class was much higher in the early years of the Tokugawa regime than it was two centuries later. The fact was beyond doubt, and this code proved that four centuries earlier their social standing and privileges were even higher; for under the Hojo regime women could be heads of fiefs, and the wife could hold separately from her husband. The institutory Oath, that henceforth all important judgments should be rendered by the Council as a body after full discussion and in accordance with the principles of these articles of judicature was next read and commented on; and the reader concluded by paying a high tribute of respect to the memory of Hojo Yasuaki, the author of the Code, whose virtues as a ruler and statesman would bear comparison with those of Tokugawa Iyeyasu.

After the lecture, the President said he was sure that all were entertained and instructed by what Mr. Hall had said and that all were grateful for the lecture, which he thought was too short. These were clearly the thoughts of all present, for no one realised that a full half hour had been used up in the exposition.

Mr. Vickers, as Secretary, begged to usurp the place of the President for a moment to put in words what he was sure all present felt: namely, grateful appreciation of the kind hospitality of the British Ambassador and Lady MacDonald in entertaining the Society. This kindness was all the greater, since, on the eve of the arrival of Prince Arthur on a special mission from England to Japan and in the midst of many preparations, it must cause great inconvenience to the Ambassador and Lady MacDonald.

The President replied that it was a pleasure to entertain the Society, and expressed regret that Lady MacDonald was unavoidably prevented from being present. He then declared the meeting adjourned, and invited all to partake of refreshments which would at once be served.

THE BOHEMIAN CONCERT.

On Saturday evening the Bohemian Male Quartette gave their concert at the Public Hall to a crowded house; the variety of languages and nationalities represented in the programme, and the press encomiums recorded in favour of the company of artists having naturally appealed to all branches of this cosmopolitan community. And there can be no doubt, if one may judge by the enthusiastic applause with which almost every item of the programme was received, that the concert was a great success. The management can scarcely be complimented on having contributed towards this end, however, as when the curtain was supposed to be rung up, at a little past 9 p.m. there was a perfectly bare stage facing the auditorium and the first item to arouse the interest of the large and good-natured audience was the incursion through their ranks of a small army of coolies bodily carrying the old Public Hall piano from its resting place in the ante-room—where it had been utilised as a hat and cloak receptacle—on to the stage. The piano, however, was not required for the first number on the programme, as it was only used in accompanying the solos. The opening quartette, "Oh, sweetest Darling," by Roykosy, was sung in English, and served as well as many of the succeeding numbers to bring out the strong points of the vocal combination—absolute accuracy in time, beautiful modulation of tone and harmonious blending of the four voices. The second item, the prologue from the Italian opera "Pagliacci" was rendered in fine voice and with good effect by Mr. J. Novak, the baritone of the quartette, the piano accompaniment being most sympathetically played by Mr. R. Cerny, who sings second tenor in the quartette. The third item comprised two selections in German by the quartette, (a) Mendelssohn's "Nachtgesang," and (b) Koschat's "Fürsterlein," the artistic rendering of which elicited an undeniable encore. In response the quartette gave the Bohemian National Song, with vocal and labial imitations of a brass band as interludes and accompaniments. The next number was a bass solo by Mr. A. Svojsik, "Bible Songs," in English, which we cannot help thinking was a poor selection in which to bring out the undoubtedly fine tones of the company's basso, as displayed in the part numbers. The last item in the first part, the quartette, in French, "Serenade d'Hiver," was again encored and was followed by an Alsatian song which was also warmly applauded. The quartette opened the second part with (a) Raff's "Fisherman's Song" and (b) an American Negro Song. Both were excellently rendered and in response to a further demand the quartette gave another minstrel melody; "My Lizabee," with a very clever imitation of banjo accompaniment, which fairly brought down the house, and was by far the best and most appropriate of what might be styled the buffo business of the company. Artistically considered, the next number, by Mr. Chas. Severling, the tenor, of (a) a German operatic aria, and (b) a selection from Verdi's "Rigoletto," was the gem of the evening. The singer has a fine voice and is evidently cut out for grand opera, and his solos elicited an enthusiastic recall, which was good-naturedly responded to, though his work throughout the evening had been sufficiently trying. The Slavic National songs which followed were very entertaining, and a duet between the tenor and bass was very well rendered. The evening's entertainment concluded with a musical medley by the quartette which was very amusing.

MOUNTAINEERING IN THE CAUCASUS.

A large and appreciative audience gathered in the Van Schaick Hall on Wednesday evening to hear Mr. George Kennan's lecture on "Mountaineering in the Caucasus." Mr. Kennan, who has spent the last two years in the Far East, is returning to America, and the opportunity of hearing him lecture again was too good to be lost. Dr. Dearing introduced him to the audience as an old friend, and Mr. Kennan received the heartiest of welcomes. He began by giving a description of the geographical position of the Caucasus, which he holds to be the most wonderful mountain group in the world, and then passed on to a vivid description of the strange mixture of races which inhabit its mountain peaks and almost inaccessible valleys, races, or remains of races, which maintained their independence century after century against the assaults of Persians, Greeks, Romans, Tartars, Mongols and Crusaders until Russia finally trampled them under foot. Mr. Kennan is a past master in the art of word painting and very beautiful were the pictures he drew of the scenery, barbaric customs, and social complexities of the dwellers in the Caucasus. He made his trip through the Eastern Caucasus in company with a Circassian Prince who was returning home after a visit to the Russian capital. Warned by the Prince of the excessive hardships and perilous nature of the journey, Mr. Kennan resolved all the same to attempt it. His courage was put to the severest tests, but he won through, though he acknowledged that his hair-breadth escapes, particularly on one ride down a mountain pass, taxed his nervous resources to the utmost. His description of this ride was particularly thrilling and it is no exaggeration to say that his audience accompanied him every inch of the way: squirming round zigzag corners as he squirmed, slipping on a six inch path of crumbling slate when his marvellously sure-footed mountain horse slipped; hanging between heaven and oblivion as a particularly nasty corner was negotiated. At one point in the descent, Mr. Kennan, looking down the side of the precipice, which fell sheer for 2,000 feet, caught sight of a Caucasian eagle slowly wheeling through the air, and the thought flashed across his mind, "how badly I should disturb that bird if I fell off now"—so closely does the ridiculous jostle with the sublime. A big sigh of relief was drawn by his hearers when Mr. Kennan once more reached comparative safety. Very interesting was his description of some of the Caucasian dances which he saw, and in one of which he unwillingly took part; of the blood feuds which lead to so many sudden deaths among the mountaineers; of the queer survivals of ancient forms of jurisprudence which have disappeared from Europe hundreds of years ago. After giving a description of the melodious muezzin—the Mahomedan call for prayer—which is heard morning and night throughout the Caucasus, Mr. Kennan translated several of the wild mountain songs, dealing with strange beliefs and even queerer ideals. The lecture concluded with a masterly description of the last stand made for freedom in the Caucasus. The leader of the mountaineers was Shamyl, who held the position for nearly forty years. Reduced at last to a band of 300 they retreated to a high, isolated mountain mass in Daghestan known as Gunib. They provisioned this stronghold and were prepared to hold out indefinitely, for the place was considered impregnable, being surrounded by sheer precipices except on the north side, which was approached by a narrow mountain trail easily defended by a handful of men. Marshal Bariatinsky, the Russian commander, had 28,000 men with him and after months of incessant repulses, his sappers under cover of moonless nights drove a ladder of spikes and ropes up the face of the undefended precipice. The work took time, but it was finally accomplished, and early one morning a thousand Cossacks swarmed up the face of the cliff and climbed over into the basin of Gunib. Taken entirely unprepared, for the mountaineers had no knowledge whatever of the approach of the enemy from that side of the mountain, the Caucasians sold their lives to the last man and freedom among their wild and lovely hills was finally crushed under the iron heel of the Russian Tsar. It was a stirring story excellently well told. Mr. Kennan was accorded a hearty vote of thanks, on the proposition of Dr. Dearing, upon resuming his seat.

CUSTOMS PROTEST.

On March 9th, the Director of the Yokohama Customs delivered a decision on a protest brought up by Messrs. Becker and Co., No. 195, Yamashita-cho. The firm imported alpaca with a certificate of origin, on which the authorities of the department of appraisement imposed a specific duty at the rate of sen 7½ per square yard in accordance with No. 324 of the tariff. The importers contended that the article should be dealt with under No. 340 of the same tariff and the duty should be ad val. 10 per cent., and that the article could not be classified among alpaca goods. The protest was dismissed on the ground that many alpaca goods imported hitherto into Japan were made with cotton either in warp or woof, and that these were always taken as alpaca in accordance with the instructions of the Minister for Finance who had rejected appeals in numerous previous cases as to this material.

A revolting scene was recently witnessed in a menagerie at Auray, near Morbihan. It had been announced that a girl ten years of age would dance in a lion's cage. A crowded audience assembled to witness the morbid spectacle. Scarcely had the child entered and begun her paces when the lion bounded upon her, knocked her down, and begun tearing her body with his paws. The tamer rushed in with a pronged pole and drove the beast off, but the little girl was carried to hospital in a pitiable condition, and there she subsequently died.

TABLEAUX VIVANTS IN TOKYO.

The first of the two entertainments arranged by ladies and gentlemen of the Tokyo foreign community for the benefit of the sufferers from the Famine took place at the residence of H. E. Viscount Aoki, in Kojimachi, on Thursday evening. The private theatre in the Viscount's house, a comfortable and elegant apartment with arched roof, decorated in white enamel, opening from one of the drawing rooms by a portière, is admirably suited for an entertainment of this character. It provides seating capacity for some one hundred and sixty or seventy guests, and needless to say was filled to its utmost capacity on this occasion. No less than eighteen different Tableaux had been arranged, as follows:—

Dani (Empress Josephine), Mrs. Sanguinetti (Florence Nightingale), Mde. Blümer (Queen Louise of Prussia), Mrs. Ozaki (Madame Rochambeau), Mrs. Grieve (Mrs. Washington), Mrs. Cowen (Mrs. Martha Washington), Baronne Corvisart; Miss Corvisart (Jeanne d'Arc), Miss Scherechewsky (Thusnelda), Miss Grace Thompson (Queen Elizabeth), Miss Ruth Thompson (Dante), Miss Dorothy Barclay (Beatrice), Misses Annie and Bessie McKim (Indian Girls), Miss Ivy MacDonald (Angel of Peace of the West), Miss J. Brinkley (Spirit of Peace, Japan), Misses Stella MacDonald, Marshall, Conder, Helen Conder, Denning, Theo. Duer, Bruzel, Mai Takayanagi, Helen Takayanagi, B. Ozaki, Mildred and Lettice Woodward, Salome Woodman, Jeannie Greene, Hasu Gardiner, Margaret Hall, Margaret Kirby, Alida Swift, and Dorothy Cowen; Mr. Geo. Lynch (Sir Francis Raleigh), Mr. Gardiner (Arminius), Capt. Pershing (Germanicus), Count Mucellies (Napoleon), Baron de Barente (Charles VI.), Mr. O. McKee (Cardinal), Baron Corvisart, Captain Dani, Lieut. Marble, Prof. Terry, Prof. Sprague, Dr. Wunsch, Messrs. N. de Frietas, Anderson, Walter, Williams, B. Poole, Nonweiler, Chester Hill, Carol Miller, Ernest Swift, &c.

From this it will be seen that the caste was a very full one and in some of the tableaux as many as ten characters were grouped on the stage at one time. To describe the various costumes, of so many different eras and characters, would be a task beyond our skill or scope. But great pains had been taken and apparently no expense spared to carry out the style and details of each particular period and character, and the result was certainly most brilliant and enchanting. Moreover the background for each tableau had been carefully designed and studied, and carried out most skilfully to suit the scene represented. For this beautiful mounting the community is indebted, we understand, to Professor Wada, of the Ueno Academy of Fine Arts, who, together with his pupils, had devoted no end of time, love and skill to the work. The electric light was excellently managed, and the various tableaux stood out clear and distinct in front of the scene, displaying to full advantage the expressive gestures and posing of the living pictures as well as the studied details of their garb and character. It would be an invidious task to say which was the most beautiful of the numerous tableaux displayed, as all were striking and interesting. A fine string band was stationed in the verandah adjoining the theatre, and played appropriate airs as each picture was presented, and added much to the effect of the displays.

The thanks of the whole community are due to H. E. Viscount and Viscountess Aoki for their open-handed hospitality in throwing open their establishment for the entertainment, and the pains they have taken to make it, as it was, an almost unprecedented success, as well as to the ladies and gentlemen who have expended so much time and trouble in the matter; and in this connection we cannot omit to draw attention to the special and valuable services of Mrs. Hugh Fraser, who undertook and most indefatigably carried out, to the great satisfaction of all concerned, the onerous task of stage manager. It is satisfactory to know that this charming entertainment will be repeated on Saturday evening next, and it is the hope of all those who travelled up from Yokohama to see the Tableaux that the ladies and gentlemen taking part may be induced to give the same entertainment in the Public Hall, Yokohama—say at a matinée. Nous verrons.

THE BIG FIRE IN KOBE.

With regard to the big fire which destroyed the Oriental Hotel Annexe on Friday morning, the Kobe Herald says that the alarm was first sounded at about 3.30 a.m., when one of the night watchmen noticed smoke issuing from the premises in the basement occupied by Messrs. T. A. Christensen & Co. Two of the hotel employees, Messrs. Martin and Cameron, were at once called. Breaking open the door giving access to Messrs. Christensen & Co.'s outer office, they found the place full of smoke. Further help was promptly summoned and for a time it seemed likely that the outbreak would be suppressed. Unfortunately the fire had secured a firm hold of the building and by the time the Fire Brigade arrived on the scene it had gone too far. It is probable that it had been slowly spreading for some time beneath the flooring or between the divisions of the wall. No flames could be seen at the outset, so the efforts to bring the Minimax Extinguisher into play were futile. But not until 4.30 was it clear that the building was doomed. In the meantime every possible pains had been taken by the management to arouse all the guests in the annexe, and as a result almost all managed to save their effects. There were, however, some exceptions, notably those of Madame de Ranal, who arrived from Miyajima while the fire was at its height, and whose effects were in charge of her maid, and Mr. Ed. Van Nierop, head of the firm of Ed. L. Van Nierop & Co., who was living in the hotel. This gentleman generously devoted his attention to the work of assisting some of the ladies in the annexe to save their effects, and when he was able to look after his own personal belongings his room was cut off. These, we believe, are the only cases of serious loss by the Hotel visitors. The occupants of the ground floor have lost almost everything. They include the Shanghai Toilet Club, Messrs. Petit & Co., Import Merchants, the Welcome Society, and Dr. Gray B. Perl, Dentist. Fortunately the last named gentleman was able to remove several of his appliances before the flames reached the north western part of the building. His loss, nevertheless, will be very considerable, we fear.

THE LAW COURTS.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

The fourth sitting in connexion with the trial of those alleged to be connected with the Tokyo disturbances was held on March 9th in the Tokyo District Court. Some witnesses were examined after which counsel for the defence asked the Court for leave to examine Viscount Yoshikawa, formerly Minister for Home Affairs; Mr. Adachi, formerly Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police Office; Mr. Nakakoji, Director of the Bureau of Police Affairs; Mr. Kawakami, a police inspector; and Mr. Okuniya, formerly Chief Public Procurator of the Tokyo District Court. The Court rejected the request and adjourned the case till March 16th.

OBJECTION TO SEIZURE.

The hearing of an action filed by Mr. H. V. Gielen against Mr. Paul Helm, presenting an objection as to the seizure of buildings, began on March 12th in the Yokohama District Court, before Judge Nagata.

Plaintiff was represented by Mr. R. Ideura and the defendants by Mr. W. Nagashima.

At the outset of the hearing, the plaintiff's Counsel said that the present action had close connection with another case which is still under examination in the Tokyo Appeal Court. After the conclusion of that case, it would be convenient to the Court and the parties to explain the reasons for the present action. Counsel asked the Court to adjourn the hearing until the other case was concluded.

Defendant's Counsel held that the plaintiff's objection had no relation to the case still under examination in Tokyo, and that even if there was a connection in regard to some points, the request of the plaintiff's Counsel to adjourn the hearing was quite groundless.

As to the cause of the action, plaintiff's Counsel gave a lengthy statement in which he said that seven brick buildings, two stone buildings and one wooden building on lot No. 156, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, were in 1871 owned by Mr. James Hughes. These houses were rented by two Chinamen named Tong Ho-tung and Yei Fu-ming on March 4th, 1882, for twenty years' on emphyteusis. On May 30th the following year, Tong Ho-tung borrowed fifty-five hundred dollars from Mr. James Martin, offering a portion of the building in the emphyteusis contract as security for the loan. Later the Chinese paid back fifteen hundred dollars to Mr. James Martin, leaving a balance of four thousand dollars, after which he transferred his rights in the buildings to another Chinese merchant named Ying Hsing-lung. This was on Jan. 30th, 1889, and the sum which passed was six thousand dollars. At the same time, Tung Ho-tung paid one thousand dollars, leaving still a balance of three thousand dollars. The balance was paid on Nov. 1st, 1889. On the other hand Ying Hsing-lung transferred the rights to Cheong Ming-ku on Oct. 1st, 1900. Mr. Gielen, the plaintiff in the case, lent four thousand yen to Cheong Ming-ku and later six thousand yen and the buildings were offered as security. On Nov. 1st, 1900, the new tenant purchased the buildings for thirty thousand yen. He, however, being unable to raise the amount, borrowed it from Mr. L. C. MacMillan under guarantee of Mr. H. V. Gielen. This amount was paid to Mr. James Hughes. On the due day, as the Chinaman was unable to redeem the loan from Mr. MacMillan, Mr. Gielen paid it on behalf of the borrower and received a contract that the buildings should be transferred to him should the Chinaman fail to repay the amount. Later the Chinaman died without redeeming the loan. Naturally the buildings were owned by Mr. Gielen. It might be noted here, added plaintiff's Counsel, that perpetual leases were not granted to any Chinese residents before the enforcement of the revised treaty and consequently the registry of the lease was continued in Mr. MacMillan's name though it passed through the hands of several Chinamen. At the time when the perpetual right was transferred from Cheong Ming-ku, Mr. Gielen did not pay attention to the matter of registration. This defect on the part of the plaintiff had brought about the trouble which he had not anticipated.

Mr. Paul Helm, who are alleged to be one of the creditors against the estate of the late Chinaman, Cheong Ming-ku, seized the buildings which they afterwards ascertained had passed into the possession of Mr. Gielen.

Defendants' Counsel asked plaintiff of whom the latter had purchased the buildings. Plaintiff's counsel replied that he had ostensibly bought the property from Mr. MacMillan, but practically from Cheong Ming-ku.

Defendants' counsel said that in law there could be no difference and asked plaintiff's Counsel to give a definite answer. Plaintiff's Counsel replied that there could be no other statement as to facts.

Defendants' Counsel said that the contention of plaintiff evidently was that he purchased the buildings formally from Mr. Macmillan. Consequently he had no relation with Cheong Ming-ku who owed the money to defendants, and accordingly his objection as to seizure by defendants was unreasonable. Thereupon, the defendants' Counsel went into a technical description of the law applying to the case, after which plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court to temporarily estop the hearing until the other case was concluded. The Court, after consultation, rejected the request. The plaintiff's Counsel then asked the Court to adjourn the case for further preparation of evidence. The Court gave consent and the hearing was adjourned sine die.

CLAIM FOR SHORT DELIVERY.

The hearing of the case in which Messrs Mendelson Bros. claim twelve hundred yen from the Yokohama agents, Messrs. Butterfield and Swire, of the Ocean Steamship Co., and the China Mutual Steam Navigation Co., was resumed on March 13th in the Yokohama District Court.

Chun Fai-phong, a Chinese employee of Messrs. W. M. Strachan and Co., and K. Kobayashi, one of the tallymen employed by Capt. Weston, were examined as witnesses.

Chun Fai-phong deposed that a part of a consignment of tin-plates consigned to Messrs W. M. Strachan and Co., was left undelivered by Capt. Weston, the landing agent of defendants. Witness saw a pile of tin plates in the customs compound. These were alleged to be a portion of those remaining undelivered to Messrs Strachan and Co. He gave the bill of lading to the landing agent before the complete delivery of the cargo. Owing to the breaking of the cases, the contents—tin-plates—were piled up in the duty-free depot. He did not remember when he saw these tin-plates as the time was so long ago. When he saw the lot, Capt. Weston told him that it was a portion of the tin-plates consigned to his firm. As the packing was all torn away there was no mark by which they could be identified. The tin-plates in the pile at the duty-free depot were exactly the same as those he saw later in a bonded warehouse. Probably the tin-plates in the former depot would have been removed later to the bonded warehouse in accordance with Customs Regulations after the expiry of the period of grace. Capt. Weston also told him that the lot was the same as those removed from the duty-free depot.

Cross-examined by defendant's Counsel, witness said that he did not remember whether Messrs. Butterfield and Swire asked Messrs. W. M. Strachan and Co., to take delivery of the tin-plates in the bonded warehouse. However, witness thought they had not been asked direct by Messrs. Butterfield and Swire to do so. The agents' business was merely to countersign the bill of lading, "Please deliver to Messrs. Strachan & Co., on endorsement," while Captain Weston, the landing agent, attended to the business of delivery.

Re-examined by plaintiff's Counsel, witness said that the endorsement was duly signed by his firm and the ships' agents attached their counter-signature.

K. Kobayashi, another witness, being shown Exhibit A-5 said that the packing of the tinplates was torn off, consequently marks and counter-numbers could not be identified. As the marks and counter-numbers were unascertainable, the consignees—Messrs. Strachan and Co.—were unable to pass the Customs against the permit certifying the marks, etc. Under these circumstances, witness gave the document, Exhibit A-5, on behalf of Captain Weston. This document certified that the tin-plates in broken parcels were from the cases which bore the necessary marks and counter-numbers. The lot of tin-plates in the bonded warehouse represented forty-eight cases of materials of a large size and twenty-four cases of similar materials of a small size. The goods were landed from the Kaisow and Diomed. These were removed to the bonded warehouse after three months' grace. These materials did not belong to Messrs. Strachan and Co., as witness explained to a Chinese employee of the firm.

Examined by plaintiff's Counsel, witness said that there were two lots of tin-plates, one for Messrs. Strachan and Co., and another for Messrs. Mendelson and Co. The tin-plates now in the bonded warehouse had no connexion with Exhibit A-5. With regard to the short delivery of cargo for Messrs. Mendelson Bros., Mr. G. S. Nelson, one of the employees of Capt. Weston, certified on the back of the bill of lading with red ink, after which the document was given back to the consignees by either Capt. Weston or Messrs. Butterfield and Swire.

Cross-examined by Defendant's Counsel, witness said that no tinplates to be delivered to Messrs. Strachan and Co., were left in the Customs compound. Questioned whether he knew of a dispute between Messrs. Strachan and Co., and Messrs. Butterfield and Swire as to short delivery of cargoes landed from the Deucalion and Machaon, witness replied that the trouble was settled as the alleged shortage was all delivered.

Counsel then discussed the meaning of the advertisements issued by shipping agents under the heading "notice to consignees"—after which the Court adjourned the hearing till April 6th.

A CHIP-BRAID CLAIM.

The hearing of a case filed by R. Tanaka, a chip-braid merchant, against Messrs Carlowitz and Co., claiming yen 696.83, was resumed on March 13th in the Yokohama District Court.

Defendants' Counsel said that his clients did not order chip-braid from plaintiff but gave an order for similar material to Ishiwata, a manufacturer, residing at the village of Chofu, near Shinagawa. As to the exhibits A-1-5 produced by plaintiff, defendants' Counsel said that Messrs. Carlowitz did not recognise the letters as they had not seen or touched them before.

Plaintiff's Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine Y. Suzuki a chip-braid manufacturer as a witness, and the defendant's Counsel asked for the calling of K. Nakano for a similar purpose. The court gave consent to plaintiff's request only. The case was adjourned till March 22nd.

PETITION IN BANKRUPTCY.

The hearing of an action instituted by Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co. asking for a decision in bankruptcy against R. Okawa, drug dealer, was resumed on March 15th in the Yokohama District Court.

The Court received the opinion of Mr. Awata, an expert in handwriting, which was not disclosed at the previous hearing. The expert held that the signatures and seals on the power-of-attorney given by the defendant to his Counsel and those on Exhibit A-1 regarding a contract handed by defendant to Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co. were the same.

As to the official copy of a telegram which defendant's Counsel insisted had been despatched in Bingo province last year, the Court said that no reply had been received from the Department of Communications, although the authorities had again been applied to.

Defendant's Counsel, producing a number of documents, said that there was no doubt that the defendant was absent from Yokohama from Oct. 26th to Dec. 5th last. The signatures and seals affixed to the documents showed that these were exactly the same as those on the power-of-attorney, but were not similar to those on the contract, Exhibit A-1, submitted by plaintiffs. One of the documents was an official letter certifying that the defendant closed his business on January 29th this year.

Plaintiffs' Counsel refused to admit these documents as evidence. Thereupon the defendant's Counsel asked the Court for leave to summon two other experts in handwriting.

Plaintiffs' Counsel said that though the Japanese merchant was absent as alleged by his Counsel, the business was practically carried on by his authorized employees, including his elder brother, named T. Okawa. Consequently defendant could not escape from any obligations arising from the business. Counsel further said that there would be no necessity to examine other experts to compare defendant's signature and seals since Mr. Awata had given a valuable opinion. The official certificate as to the closing of defendant's business could not be received, for as a matter of fact he was still continuing his business. Plaintiffs' Counsel added that T. Okawa, elder brother of the defendant, was fully authorized as manager, and that whenever defendant went on a business journey the manager attended to business on behalf of defendant. Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine Mr. K. Ito, manager of the Yokohama Jitsugyo Bank, with which the defendant had close business connections.

The Court did not give consent to this request, but decided to summon two other experts in handwriting.

The hearing was adjourned till March 29th.

A shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama at 8.31 p.m. on March 14th, the duration being two minutes and five seconds. The direction was N. N. W. to S. S. E. The nature of the motion was somewhat serious.

At 10.30 p.m. on March 13th, a strong shock of earthquake was felt in Kumamoto.

The Moto-machi School will remove to the new building at No. 37, Bluff, at the end of March and the Yokohama Girls' High School will remove to the old building on Shiokumi-zaka. On March 24th and 25th, this latter school will hold a bazaar to raise a fund for their institute. On this occasion a musical programme, dances, etc., will be given.

A case of small-pox was reported as having occurred among the Chinese steerage passengers on board the American mail steamer Siberia, which arrived at Yokohama at 6 a.m. on March 12th, from Hongkong. The vessel was at once ordered to the Nagahama Quarantine Station for disinfection and the patient was removed to hospital. After disinfecting measures had been taken the Siberia was dispatched to San Francisco on Wednesday.

The Hon. Luke Wright, the new American Ambassador to Tokyo, will leave on March 29th by the Minnesota for Yokohama. Viscount Aoki, Minister to Washington, will leave Yokohama on April 6th by the Empress of India for Vancouver on his way to his post. The Asahi says that the American members of the Asiatic Society in Yokohama will hold a farewell dinner party on April 2nd in honour of the Japanese Ambassador, at the Oriental Palace Hotel.

The central Tea guild held a meeting on March 12th at the Sankwai-do, Akasaka, Tokyo. One of the committee said that in connexion with post bellum financial administration, the Government had decided to withdraw the subsidy of yen 55,230. Consequently, the committee proposed to abolish the offices at St. Louis, San Francisco, and to transfer the business in New York and Chicago to the Tea Export company while it would assist the office in Montreal with a grant of eight thousand yen. The proposal was approved.

The following appointments were announced on March 12th: Major-General Muda, Commander of the Maidzuru Fortress to be Commander of the Shimonoseki Fortress; Major-General Nakada, Commander of the Pescadore Fortress, to be Commander of the Sasebo Fortress; Major-General Kumamoto, to be Commander of the Maidzuru Fortress; Major-General Hara, to be Commander of the Pescadore Fortress; Major-General Nagata to be Commander of the Second Brigade of Artillery; Major-General Fukunaga, Commander of the Tokyo Bay Fortress, to be Commander of the First Brigade of Artillery. Lieut.-General Arai was removed to the retired list.

Archdeacon Price, late of Osaka, was consecrated as the first Bishop of Fuhkien, South China, on Feb. 2 at Westminster Abbey. The New Missionary Diocese has been taken out of the huge Diocese of Victoria, Hongkong, and its area is about equal to England without Wales, containing a population of 20 millions of people. The number of native Christians under the Bishop's charge are more than 11,000, with 19 native clergy, and about 130 C.M.S. missionaries, men and women. The Bishop hopes to come out to his new work during the spring, and will visit Japan to settle up his affairs here in the early summer. His transference to China will be much regretted in Kobe and Osaka, where all have learnt to value him very highly.

The report for presentation to the shareholders at the thirty-seventh ordinary general meeting, of the Hongkong Fire Insurance Company Ltd. on Wednesday, 7th March, 1906 as follows:—

1904 Account.—This account shows a profit of $220,417.66 which sum, subject to approval of the Shareholders, it is proposed to deal with as follows, viz.:—

Dividend of $25 per Share, .....	$ 200,000.00
Addition to Reserve Fund.....	20,417.66
	220,417.66

1905 Account.—The balance at credit of this account is $422,618.04.

Mortgages.—From the Reports and Valuations made by the Company's Surveyors, the General Managers and Consulting Committee as satisfied that the properties held by the Company form ample security for the advances made.

In the Tokyo District Court, four remarkable criminal cases are under trial or preliminary examination. The fourth trial of Mr. Kono Hironaka and other prominent politicians who are charged with having instigated the Tokyo disturbances, will be resumed to-day, March 16th. Two or three sittings more will be necessary. The first trial of O. Noguchi, who is charged with having murdered the well-known poet, Mr. Noguchi Neisai, will begin on March 19th. During the trial extraordinary disclosures are expected. Some hundreds of coolies who are charged with having set fire to the official residence of the Minister for Home Affairs, several police officers, etc. will be tried at the beginning of April. Mr. T. Okubo, whose preliminary examination is in progress, will also be tried. It is alleged that he murdered two silk dealers from Yamanashi prefecture, after having entertained them in his house, and stole their stock. Later the dead bodies were discovered by the police under the floor of his house.

According to the news brought by the Russian Volunteer ship Kostrona, which has arrived at Nagasaki from Vladivostok, General Mischenko, recently appointed Commander of the Vladivostok fortress, will shortly return home owing to the agitation raised against him. The relations between the General and the reformers are such that a further disturbance is hourly expected. One-third of the Russian armies in Manchuria have been repatriated by train and steamer. The delay in withdrawal is attributed to the scarcity of coal. The transportation of the remainder of the Russian armies cannot be accomplished before the end of this year. General Linevitch is now at Harbin. He recently paid a visit to Chanchun by train.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In your issue of 5th instant you published a telegram purporting to be of Reuter's Special Service, bearing the now familiar caption of "American Insurance Scandals." The telegram was:—

"The annual report of the New York Equitable Insurance Company states the insurance scandal of last year resulted in the Company losing twenty-two million pounds sterling."

To be perfectly certain of facts, I telegraphed to the Head Office for information, and now beg you will publish the following brief statement of affairs. The currency used is Japanese yen, as all accounts so far published in this country have been converted into yen at the same exchange throughout:

	December, 1904	30th September 31st December 1905	ber 1905.
Surplus.	168,321,394	139,880,969	142,612,896

These figures furnished by the Society have been verified by public accountants, who certified on November 25th last that the assets of the Society as claimed were all found on hand on 30th September, 1905, and amounted to 867,013,541 yen, as shown by the balance sheet. The surplus over and above all liabilities amounted to 139,880,969 yen. A similar certificate, I am advised by telegraph, has been furnished by the accountants to 31st December, 1905, on the increased figures of assets and surplus.

This being the financial position of the Society on 31st December, 1904, 30th September, and 31st December, 1905, it is perfectly clear that the alleged loss of £22,000,000 is devoid of foundation. The Society's assets have increased, although some of the properties have been reduced in value for the purpose of placing the assets on an absolutely sound and safe basis. This reduction in the book value of certain real estate and stocks is the explanation of the diminished surplus.

Attention must be called to the fact that, notwithstanding the revaluation and reduction of certain properties, the total assets have increased, and on 31st December, 1905, exceeded all liabilities by Yen 142,612,896. It is also gratifying to be able to state on direct authority that there have been increases in income and profits over disbursements and losses; increased payments to policyholders; and economies in the management have been effected of the greatest importance to future results of existing policies.

I submit, therefore, that the telegram published by you is inaccurate and that the Society has not suffered any part of the loss mentioned. It is most unfortunate that every opportunity should be taken to publish statements which, in their original form, are so seriously damaging and injurious, without effort being made to ascertain their truth or falsity.

I beg you will find space for this letter, which joins issue with Reuter's telegram, and I think satisfactorily dispels the evil impressions that telegram has created. It is an appeal to the reason and intelligence of the public of Japan and China and far more convincing than the mere assertion that Reuter's telegram is a mistake.

Yours faithfully,
J. T. HAMILTON,
General Manager for the East.

WARSHIP DESIGNING.

The first of a series of five Cantor lectures on "Modern Warships," given by Sir William White in January before the London Society of Arts dealt chiefly with the elementary and popular part of his subject. He pointed out the commanding influence that the gun exercised upon warship design; but contended that it was a mistake to regard the warship as simply a "floating gun-carriage," even though her primary duty was to fight. There were many other necessities for fighting efficiency. For instance, there was the important question of sub-division. A comparison of some of the earlier war vessels with those of more recent date led to a consideration of some of the leading elements of design, and the difficulty experienced in including all the multitudinous features which the advance of engineering science had introduced. The lecturer dealt at length with the use of steel for ship-building, giving an interesting account of the steps taken by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby when he was Director of Naval Construction, about thirty years previously. The material then used was mild steel; but the interesting fact was stated by Sir William that at that distant period the possibility was considered of using steel of higher tenacity, of a nature similar to that more recently employed in the construction of torpedo craft. Tests and experiments were made at the works of Sir William Siemens, at Landore, with steel having a tensile strength as high as 40 tons to the square inch. These efforts appear to have shared the fate of many others of a like nature, made by private enterprise for official purposes. Sir William referred generally to the new Cunarders now in course of construction, and in connection with which steel of higher tensile strength is being used. He made a general comparison of the weight of structure in large warships and ocean liners respectively. In the former only about 38 per cent. of the total weight could be reserved for the construction of the hull and for accessories, whilst the designer of an Atlantic liner could count on 50 per cent. for the same purpose. It was satisfactory to know that naval constructors, working under these conditions, had been able to design warships so that no cases of serious failure had occurred, owing to the excellence of workmanship and materials, and the system of inspection followed. In regard to propelling machinery also the designer of warship engines had to meet conditions and observe restrictions by which the maker of engines for mercantile vessels was not bound. A leading feature in the working of the two types of vessels was that the latter steamed from port to port under normal conditions of power, whilst the warship engineer had to provide for constant changes of speed during manœuvres or with ships in squadron; and such variations made it difficult, if not impossible, to attain a uniform economy at all speeds, comparable with that of the merchant liner always running at full power.

THE RELIGIOUS FUTURE OF JAPAN.

Professor Takakusu has an article in the last number of the London Quarterly Review, entitled "Japan Old and New," which has aroused considerable interest in England, especially with regard to its concluding section, which deals with religion. The Spectator discusses this portion of the Japanese writer's article and after summarizing its salient points remarks:—"Professor Taka-kusu's short account of the religious history of Japan leaves upon the reader an impression of a people but little exercised by dogmatic speculation, with no tendency to treat religion as an exact science, and with a capacity for suiting every religious system they have known to their particular needs. All persecution seems to have been political, and where political interests were not involved new spiritual, and moral ideas were permitted to germinate without any interference arising from the delight in polemics which distinguishes the West. They seem able to graft new ideas upon old ones without making a radical change. They are not repelled by antinomies. They can fuse ideals which are at first sight opposite,—witness the marvelous way in which they have brought together the autocratic and democratic ideals, and produced a Japanese national ideal. This capacity perhaps stands to them in the place of what is ordinarily called originality. In view of their peculiar genius, it is impossible not to surmise that the simplest, most primitive, and least doctrinal form of Christianity will finally suit them best. The faith of the Gospels has many ethical points in common with Buddhism and Confucianism, and wise Christian teachers will encourage the Shintoists, who cannot bear to part with their dead, not to sorrow as those that have no hope. One of the greatest proofs of the truth of Christianity is the way in which the highest minds outside Christendom approach to its conclusions. Hitherto, in spite of its Eastern origin, the triumphs of the Christian religion have been limited to the West. Is it not possible that the falling off of mediæval dogma, in which so many fearful Christians at home see so much danger to the faith, may be simply the necessary prelude to a new revival which will sweep away the Occidental boundaries that have hitherto confined the creed which Christ taught?"

THE CLERGY AS A SOCIAL FORCE.

Bishop Welldon has contributed to the Nineteenth Century and After, a well reasoned article entitled "The Children of the Clergy," in which he successfully combats the popular opinion that the sons of men in Holy Orders are inferior morally and economically to those of laymen in a like social position. He attributes the currency of such an opinion largely to clerical celibacy as practised in the Roman Church: "the successes are better, but the failures are worse." The Bishop has taken the trouble to examine the "Dictionary of National Biography," and with some remarkable results. To begin, he says, with the mere enumeration of names:—

Although there are, in the "Dictionary of National Biography," a good many names of sons or daughters of the clergy which can scarcely be said to merit national recognition, yet the names which I marked as worthy of remembrance for some service performed in religion, or politics, or literature, or science, or art, or commerce, or philanthropy, or warfare, or some other aspect of the various life of the nation, amounted to 1,270. Large as this number is, it consists solely of men and women whose fathers were clergymen or ministers of religion; it takes no account of the many more who were grandchildren either on their fathers' or their mothers' side, or still more remote descendants and relations of clergymen or ministers. Yet even so it allows something not far short of four hundred names for each century since the Reformation.

Then, to come to the comparisons which are proverbially objectionable: "While the eminent or prominent children of the clergy since the Reformation have, as is stated above, been 1,270, the children of lawyers and of doctors who have attained eminence or prominence in all English history have, upon a calculation as accurate as it has proved possible to make, been respectively 510 and 350." After an eloquent description of what England owes to clerical homes, Bishop Welldon proceeds:—

But the point of this article is not that the sons and daughters of the clergy have rendered greater service to the State than any other class. That may be the case; I believe it to be so; but it is not the conclusion upon which I am anxious to insist. It is rather that a State cannot afford to lose the virile and noble strength of its clerical homes. It is that the Church, in forbidding or discouraging the marriage of the clergy, pays regard exclusively to her own supposed interest, and not to civic or national efficiency. For whatever may be the spiritual or ecclesiastical benefit of the unmarried state—if, indeed, there be any at all—it remains true that the enforced celibacy of the clergy is, and is proved to be, necessarily a serious impoverishment of the national life.

ENGLAND'S WEALTH IN OIL AND CANVAS.

Valuation in art is at best an uncertain thing, as in pictures the law of supply and demand finds itself supplemented by various other considerations, such as age, critical appreciation, and the like. The world's masterpieces, however, may be valued with approximate accuracy, and the English Art Journal for January contains some particulars with regard to England's wealth in canvases. "The pictures now in the National Gallery and the Tate Gallery have cost about £750,000, some 10 per cent of which has been contributed by private persons. In 1884, when the Government was pressed to buy the 'Ansidei Madonna,' by Raphael, Sir Frederick Burton valued the picture at £115,500. Eventually £70,000 was paid for it, and Mr. Gladstone used to say: 'I have saved the taxpayers £45,000 by not listening to the advice of the director of the National Gallery.' The equestrian portrait of Charles I, by Van Dyck, was acquired for £17,500, whereas it was valued by Sir Frederick Burton at £31,500. The writer names a few masterpieces which the English have allowed to slip through their hands, and says that "the money paid for a picture is soon forgotten, the loss of a superb work of art never. If we waited till the canker of poverty was healed to make further purchases for our National Gallery, most of the fine pictures still available and required to round off the collection would have drifted out of reach." There are considerations which have been omitted in this article, however, and such are the private collections which have been turned over to the State. A notable example of these is the famous collection of the late Sir Richard Wallace; this and the other new national property add a tremendous amount to England's "artistic wealth." Velasquez's "Venus and the Mirror" has been acquired recently for the National Gallery by popular subscriptions at a cost of about £45,000.

YOKOHAMA CHESS CLUB.

Some interesting games are being played in the Championship Tourney of the Yokohama Chess Club, the winner of which becomes the holder of the President's Trophy. As will be seen by the appended score, the position at present is a very open one, and the few games to be played promise to be very keenly contested. The Trophy is at present held by Mr. E. Geiser.

in sixteen months, although she is so much bigger. This is an illustration of what a dock-ard can do at a time of pressure, and Rear-Admiral Henry D. Barry, the superintendent, and Mr. T. Mitchell, the manager of the constructive department, will be heartily congratulated, not only on their successful organisation, which has rendered this achievement possible, but on the fact that they have kept the Dreadnought's design a secret.

What will the Admiralty do with this ship of tremendous power when she is in commission and flying the white ensign? With her ten 12in guns of the latest type, in contrast with only four such weapons mounted in even the best foreign battleships, she will be equal to any two vessels now afloat. Her broadside in a sea fight will consist of the fire from no fewer than eight of these deadly pieces, and in defensive qualities, thanks to the thickness and quality of her armour, she will be immune from damage by gunfire at ordinary battle range. The Atlantic Fleet is the "pivot" force of the Navy, and consequently it is in the natural order of things that his Majesty's ship Dreadnought should be attached to this force which is commanded by Vice-Admiral Sir W. H. May. That Admiral's flagship, commanded by Captain A. C. Leveson, at the late "battle practice," when steaming at fifteen knots, fired eleven shells from her four 12in guns, and hit the target—nearly three and a half miles distant—ten times, discharged thirty-one rounds with her four 9.2in guns, making fifteen hits, and scored twenty-six hits out of seventy-one rounds from her 6in guns. If the Dreadnought, with her ten 12in guns, equals this record of the King Edward VII., she will pierce the target under similar conditions twenty times with her devastating 850lb shells. It is satisfactory to know that this vessel of unparalleled power is to be the flagship of an officer who is so keen on quick, straight shooting—the be-all and end-all of naval preparation.

When the Dreadnought joins the Atlantic Fleet in the early months of 1907, this force will be the most remarkable strategical unit which has ever been under the orders of an admiral. Its creation a year ago was a stroke of genius, since it enables the British Fleet to make use of that invaluable Imperial heritage, Gibraltar, to the best advantage. The "Rock" is the base of Admiral May's command, which is thus midway between Sir Arthur Wilson in the Channel and North Sea and Lord Charles Beresford in the Mediterranean, with Malta as his home port. As trouble threatens on the one side or other, so will Sir William May move his ships. It is the essence of war to place the most powerful units of a navy in time of war, whatever the particular character of the conflict may be, and whoever the enemy or enemies. For this reason, as they are completed for sea the battleships of the King Edward VII. type are attached to the Atlantic Fleet. In no other navy are there vessels of such concentrated power of offence and defence, and by the time the Dreadnought joins this command Admiral May will have under his control a force without a rival on the world's seas. Each unit will be supreme, whatever antagonist it may chance to meet. In battle a foe usually concentrates his fire on the senior flagship, as was illustrated by Admiral Rojdestvensky's fate on Aug. 10th last in the Sea of Japan, and consequently it is of the highest importance that this vessel should be well protected against gunfire and able to make a good reply. The Dreadnought fulfils these conditions, and it will be a proud day for the British Navy when she hoists Admiral May's flag at the head of the Atlantic Fleet, which will then be invincible in face of anything on the seas. In addition to the Dreadnought, it will comprise seven battleships of the King Edward VII. type—each mounting four 12in, four 9.2in, and ten 6in guns. Presuming that circumstances occurred which enabled each of these eight men-of-war to put in a full broadside, every minute they would discharge shells of the following weights:

Ships.	Weight of shell (lbs).
Dreadnought	6,800
Seven King Edward VII. 's	51,940
	58,740

This calculation is based on the modest assumption that from each 12in gun one shell will be fired a minute, two from each 9.2in, and five from every 6in piece. These rates are frequently exceeded, but they suffice as an average for a fleet of eight ships. On this basis we get a total discharge each minute from the Atlantic Fleet firing broadside-on at an enemy of over twenty-six tons of metal, and presuming the standard of the King Edward VII.'s 12in guns can be maintained, about twenty-three tons would find a home in the ships of any foe who chanced to be the objective.

Nothing as devastating as this concentrated destruction has even been conceived in the brain of man. It is impossible to picture the result of one minute's well-directed fire at an enemy's ships, and when one minute is followed by others, the effect would be too

H. M. S. "DREADNOUGHT."

The naval correspondent of the Daily Telegraph writes as follows in that paper of January 22nd:—

"His Majesty's ship Dreadnought, commenced Oct. 1, 1905." This is the only information which is vouchsafed even sightseers of British nationality who visit Portsmouth Dockyard to inspect—so far as the Metropolitan Police will allow—the huge man-of-war, of unrivalled fighting power, which his Majesty will launch on Feb. 10. Hitherto, at the head of a slip in which a vessel has been building a board has been placed, giving her name, displacement, principal dimensions, horse-power, and speed, but in the case of the Dreadnought not an item in the design is revealed. She remains a mystery. In appearance she suggests colossal power. She is the longest man-of-war ever constructed at the premier dockyard. Her bow projects a matter of over 30ft beyond the slip and her stern overhangs it at the other end to the extent of nearly 70ft. In fact, her length is so great that the launching-balcony which sufficed for the Britannia—one of the King Edward VII. class of battleships—has had to be removed and a new one will be erected. In spite of her colossal proportions, she looks in a fairly forward state, though she has been only four months in hand. The exterior of her hull is being painted, to give her a smart appearance, for the Royal ceremony, while the contractors or the machinery and boilers, Messrs. Vickers, Sons, and Maxim, are busy boring out the brackets for the four propellers. In the past no British battleship has had more than two screws. Her guns will all be ready to place on board as soon as the time comes, and the boilers of the successful Babcock and Wilcox water-tube type are now practically complete. The armour is also ready. After the launch consequently, the work of completing the ship will proceed without delays, such as have sometimes occurred in the past, through the non-delivery of material, and there is no doubt the vessel will be flying the white ensign within sixteen months of her commencement, thus establishing a world's record in rapidity of construction. This expedition is being resorted to not merely because quick building is cheap, but because the Admiralty desire to put the novel and revolutionary features embodied in the design, the lessons deduced from the late war, to a test at the earliest possible moment. Hitherto no battleship has been built in less than twenty-two months, and this ship displaced only 15,000 tons; now the Dreadnought, of 18,500 tons, is to be finished terrible for words, presuming the gunners get the range and fire as at target practice. To this length has the contest for sea-power gone, and this is not the end, for the time is not far distant when the British ensign will fly over fleets and squadrons of Dreadnoughts, vessels costing a million and a half sterling each or more each with ten or twelve 12in guns, which will engage an antagonist when three or four miles distant, and will pour in a succession of shells, each weighing 850lb., carrying wholesale destruction in their wake. The ingenuity of man renders war afloat increasingly tremendous in its destructive power, and along this road possibly lies the millennium, when navies shall be no more. As naval science progresses the responsibility of throwing down the gage which rests upon the Ministers of State grows. The consoling thought is that England is the only Power which next year will possess such a naval force as the Atlantic Fleet, with the Dreadnought at its head.

It is believed the Austrian delegate's proposal was inspired by Germany.

HABUTAYE AT YOKOHAMA.

As anticipated last Saturday, the state of the habutaye market remained inactive throughout the week, with the exception of one particular piece of good business. Owing to the scarcity of stocks in the interior, the Yokohama market has risen unexpectedly for some qualities, in spite of the falling off in foreign enquiries for Europe and India. In general market conditions are similar to those of the previous week.

DOMESTIC BUSINESS.

RICE.

During the week, the Osaka and Kobe markets have generally reported low prices although there have been slight fluctuations. On the other hand the Tokyo market ruled high. This was brought about almost exclusively by the speculative purchases of a few prominent brokers.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

In spite of the continuous sleepy state of the money market, the Bank of Japan recently lowered its rate of interest by  $\frac{1}{2}$  on the average, but the stock markets of Tokyo, and Osaka still remained inactive, shares of prominent steamship companies alone meeting with a good demand. Shares of cotton spinning companies were sought for by Chinese for speculative purposes. Tokyo electric railway companies were all steady, owing to the expectation of a change in the 3 sen uniform fare to 5 sen.

CHINA.

Saturday, March 17.

A Peking telegram under date of March 14th says that the Empress Dowager sympathizing with the famine-stricken people of northern Japan has presented one hundred thousand taels to the Japanese Minister as her contribution to the Famine Fund.

Japanese traders of Mukden were recently making preparations for the holding of an industrial and commercial exhibition in the city with a view to encouraging Chinese trade there. It was also intended to establish a commercial museum with the exhibits after the close of the exhibition. The Viceroy of Mukden has squashed the project by asking the Peking Government to take steps to prevent this enterprize on the ground that the city is not yet opened to foreign business and that China has not hitherto held any such exhibitions. On March 14th, the Waiwupu asked the Japanese Minister to convey the remarks of the Governor-General to the Japanese concerned. The opposition of the Viceroy seems to be very vague, but it does not appear that he will give any fuller explanation of his reasons.

A Chinese merchant of Tientsin, named Genkei, has applied to Viceroy Yuan Shi-kai for permission to carry out jointly with Japanese timber-felling on the Yalu. The Governor-General of this portion of Manchuria asked the Japanese Minister in Peking to appoint a reliable Japanese firm to attend to the work in co-operation with Chinese subjects.

Viceroy Yuan Shi-kai has presented a memorial to the Central Government in which he says, according to the Jiji's Peking correspondent, that the military railway between Hsinmingtun and Mukden was to be transferred to China, after impartial assessment, in accordance with the Japan-China Convention, upon the withdrawal of the soldiers. The departure of the armies from the district is about to be completed, and the Viceroy asks that negotiations be opened with Japan through the minister in Tokyo.

Monday, March 19.

The Jiji has a telegram from Peking to the effect that at the Russo-Chinese Conference, M. Pokotiloff is adopting an obstinate attitude refusing almost all the proposals of the China. The Russian delegate has also refused to concede any privileges with regard to timber-felling on the Yalu and the opening of several districts in the Amur province which were both confirmed by the China-Japan Treaty, and insists that the transfer of the privileges to Japan and the opening of the interior will encroach upon Russian interests obtained before the war.

M. Plancon, formerly Russian Charge d'Affaires in Peking, and one of the staff of Count Witte at the Portsmouth Negotiations, has been appointed Consul-General in Seoul and Mr. A. T. Belthenko, second interpreter of the Russian Legation in Peking, Consul at Yingkow.

The following details concerning the Nanchang Magistrate, Kiang or Chiang, who is alleged to have been fatally injured by a Roman Catholic priest, are given in a letter from the correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News at Nanchang under date of March 3.—“At 8.30 a.m. on Thursday, Chiang, magistrate of Nanchang, died of wounds inflicted while dining at the Catholic Mission. Heavily in debt, so that the family is quite poor, they were given Tls. 1,000 by the Governor. The entire populace acclaim him as a faithful magistrate, and report has it that both here and at Suichang ancestral halls will be erected to his memory. The officialdom of Nanchang went to the yamen to condole with the family and pay their respects to the dead. His young concubine has since taken opium and died, this faithfulness filling the mouths of the entire city to-day.”

While insisting on the maintenance of the China's territorial integrity, says the Jiji's Peking correspondent, Great Britain is opposed to the ideas of the Chinese authorities with regard to railway and mining concessions in Tibet and the districts of Mongolia; America is sending soldiers continuously to Manila, which demonstration, is causing uneasiness generally in China; while the Japanese Military Administrative Office is continually coming into collision with native officials on various matters, against which the Governor-General Mukden protests to the central government. On the other hand, adds the same correspondent, Germany has completed the withdrawal of her soldiers from Shantung and is about to withdraw her guards from North China. Being dissatisfied at the attitude taken by Great Britain, America and Japan China displays an inclination to draw closer to Germany. The correspondent concludes that the delay in the departure of Baron Mumm for Tokyo may be attributed to the foregoing circumstances.

The Chinese Finance Department has ordered the Taotai of Shanghai not to purchase any more copper from foreign countries, as a hundred thousand piculs of the ore are still in stock at Soochow.

Tuesday, March 20.

A report comes from Shanghai that on March 17th, a number of natives attacked a Christian (Protestant) Church at Hsiao-chang in the neighbourhood of Shanghai in Chekiang province (the Viceroy of which is Wei Kuang-tuo), and destroyed the building. The causes of the disturbance, according to telegrams to the Asahi and Hochi, were the refusal of the church to contribute money towards funds needed for a Buddhist festival, and a consequent collision between the villagers and the native Christians.

According to a Chinese paper in Peking, the Russian representative has submitted two demands to the Peking Government: (1) that Russia and China should engage jointly in timber-felling on the Sungari; and (2) compensation to be paid by China for damage sustained by Russia in the capture of the destroyer Ryesitelni by Japan and the sinking of another destroyer in a harbour of Pechili. The Hochi's Peking telegram, under date of March 17th, conveyed information of the same kind with regard to the Ryesitelni and says that as counter-claim, the Chinese commissioners insist on repayment of the customs duty which the Russians collected at Yinkow. The parties hold to their demands so that the negotiations are delayed. The correspondent adds, however, that according to later reports, the parties have withdrawn their claims.

The North-China Daily News says that news was received in Shanghai on March 13th of the mysterious disappearance of three well-known journalists. Colonel Artemieff, Mr. Veroshikin, and Mr. Tchernikofsky, from Harbin, and the stoppage of their newspaper, the Novi Krai formerly of Port Arthur. It is supposed that they have been arrested and put out of the way.

A Dairen (formerly Dalny) telegram dated March 17th says that the withdrawal of the Armies from Manchuria has been completed. In celebration of the fact Admiral Nakajima, commander of the Dairen naval station, has given a garden party.

During the period from Oct. 20th last to Feb. 13th, the Russian armies withdrawn from Manchuria number 5,216 officers and 426,866 men. Of these, 660 officers and 49,746 soldiers were transferred to Vladivostok and Ussuri.

Wednesday, March 21.

The shareholders of the Ye-Han Railway, which has been organized in opposition to the views of Viceroy Tsen Chun-Hsuen, of the Liang-Kwang, held a meeting on March 15th. They decided (1) to pay taels 1,320,000 as a first installment and to deposit the amount in a Chinese bank; (2) to have the directors elected by the shareholders and to admit no official interference in the elections; (3) to appoint Mr. Leong Hsiao-san, a merchant, as Vice-President; (4) the President of the company to decide any difference in views that may arise between the corporation and the Viceroy and (5) the directors to ask the Department of Commercial Affairs for a permit to commence the work of construction.

The construction of the Shanghai-Nanking Railway is in progress. A section between Narin and Fantsz will shortly be opened for traffic. The work between Shanghai and Soochow will be completed within four months.

The Governor-General of Mukden has asked the central government to provide a bank in his city for the purpose of controlling financial affairs in Manchuria and also for the redeeming of war-notes now in circulation there. He added that the measures being taken by the Yokohama Specie Bank for redeeming the notes are futile.

Thursday, March 22.

The magistrates and governors of the Amur province have informed the Waiwupu that the Russians are occupying the districts along the East-China Railway in the Kirin and Amur provinces which are not included in the Japan-Russian Treaty and that the natives are consequently in difficult circumstances. These Chinese officials advise the authorities of the Foreign Office to regulate the limits of districts in a convention to be concluded during the present negotiations. The occupation, however, seems to be merely temporary. The Russian armies are being withdrawn from the front and naturally they were stationed at various places along the railway with the view of taking the trains in their proper order. According to latest telegrams from Manchuria, two-thirds of the Russian troops are still in the country.

The French Minister in Peking complains that the Chinese soldiers, who were stationed near the Catholic Church in Nanchang destroyed by the natives in the recent disturbance, did not attempt to quell the mob. The Governor of Kiangsi, however, has wired to the central government that the people of the city were at the moment in a most violent state, creating fears of further trouble arising on the slightest pretext. If the soldiers had been sent to the scene at that critical time, the people would have been more than ever excited and would probably have destroyed churches. For this reason the soldiers were kept where they were.

The Waiwupu intends to erect a special building in Peking in which to receive distinguished foreigners. With this purpose in view the authorities have employed an American architect.

Owing to the illness of M. Pokotiloff,

Russian representative, the Russo-Chinese negotiations are temporarily at a standstill.

Viceroy Yuan Shi-kai has been advising prominent traders in Tientsin to establish a timber association with a capital of half a million taels to work jointly with the Japanese in timber-felling on the Yalu. A Shanghai telegram to the Asahi corroborates the foregoing message to the extent that some Chinese merchants of Tientsin have agreed to start timber-felling in Manchuria with a capital of five hundred thousand taels. The promoters have asked the Department of Commercial Affairs for a charter.

The Dalai Lama, who was reported last year to have left Kulon for home, is now said to be still in the Mongolian city. The Asahi has a Peking telegram saying that he will shortly leave for San-in-woen on his way to Tibet.

On March 18th, Baron Mumm von Schwarzenstein, German Minister, paid a visit to the Chinese Foreign Office and pointing out that there were appearances of an outbreak of disturbance in Szechuan and Fukien against foreign churches, advised the Waiwupu to take the necessary steps to prevent such occurrences. Otherwise the Powers will be furnished with a pretext for intrigues, and Germany will cancel her proposal to withdraw foreign troops from North China.

Governor Chang of Chekiang has intimated to the British Consul in Shanghai, according to an Asahi Peking telegram, that the construction of the proposed Soochow-Ningpo Railway will be dealt with by the natives of the districts through which it is to pass and that consequently the agreement made between the local government office and a British syndicate in regard to the enterprise should be cancelled. Sir Ernest Satow, British Minister, has protested to the Peking Government against the proposed cancelling of the agreement and contends that the contract cannot be made null and void.

The Peking Government has decided to publish an official Gazette.

Friday, March 23.

The telegraph line between Kirin and Amur is reported to be under the control of the Russians. The Chinese Foreign Office has asked M. Pokotiloff, the Russian Minister, to restore it to the competent Chinese authorities in the provinces, and with this view to immediately instruct the Russian military officials.

The American Minister in Peking has complained to the Waiwupu that the hostile measures adopted towards American merchandise are still being carried out at Hankow and other places. He requests that instructions be given to the Governor-General of the Hu-kwan provinces to take steps for at once stopping these demonstrations.

The Governor-General of Mukden, according to the Fiji's Peking correspondent, has intimated to the central government that the Japanese at Yei-yuen-pao are levying a tax on the natives under the pretext of using the proceeds to repair the public roads. He regards their conduct as an encroachment upon Chinese financial and administrative rights. The Viceroy asked that instructions be sent to Mr. Yang, Minister in Tokyo, to bring this matter before the Japanese Government with a view to the stopping of this practice.

A curious instance of the excess of zeal which is apt to characterise Chinese reformers is recorded in a letter of March and from the Swatow correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News.

"Foreigners," he writes, "are not the only people guilty of indiscretion in this happy land. Recently a pupil from one of the government schools was on his way home. Passing a wayside shrine an excess of iconoclastic zeal seized him, and he proceeded to demolish the idols. As he was dressed in semi-foreign clothes the natives at first took him for a cross-sea missionary with new methods, and did not dare to molest him. Encouraged by his immunity from harm, he repeated his performance at every temple and shrine he passed; until at last the cumulative transgression overcame the fears of the people, and they sallied forth to treat the imagebreaker with some of his own sauce. He has escaped, but leaves a heavy bill to be paid by the man who comes after him!"

RECENT EARTHQUAKE SCARE IN TOKYO.

The Fiji Shimpō has a very sensible article on this subject. If any nation in the world can get accustomed to the instability of all things mundane, the Japanese people should have reached this happy state by this time, says our contemporary. Think of the centuries of experience of earth tremors that we have had. An earthquake, to most of us, might be no more than a passing breeze. We may say, by the way, that this indifference to earthquakes has become part of the moral code of the majority of Japanese gentlemen. We once asked an eminent school teacher what he did when a very severe earthquake occurred during his lecture. "Keep my seat and go on quietly with the lecture," he replied. "But," I said, "supposing you thought the building might come down on your head, would you remain in the room and be killed?" "Most certainly," he replied. "One can only die once and we Japanese like to die in a dignified manner. If a teacher were to go rushing out of a class room in front of the students, in order to escape from an earthquake, he would lose the respect of the whole school and become a butt of ridicule. Equanimity and self-control under all circumstances in this country are expected of everybody and especially from men who set themselves up as instructors of others. For a school-teacher to act as you suggest would mean the loss of his reputation for level-headedness." To return to the Fiji's comments. The scare which took place in Tokyo when Prince Arthur was attending a concert at the Uyeno Musical Academy was an incident much to be regretted from our point of view. It showed how superstitious and ignorant most of our people are despite the continual boast that education has made wonderful progress among us. Accustomed to read day after day forecasts of the weather, many silly people evidently thought that the prediction that an earthquake was to take place on a certain day at a certain hour was not at all incredible. It was to them only another proof of the great progress made by modern science. Of course had such persons taken the trouble to read what has been written on earthquakes they would have known that seismologists have as yet obtained no information that enables them to fix the day or the hour when mother earth will grow frivolous and dance her children up and down. It is somewhat disappointing, continues the Fiji, to find that, though so favourably situated for making observations, our Japanese seismologists have not yet reached the point of being able to predict accurately the occurrence of an earthquake. There are in the Imperial University in Tokyo three places devoted to the special study of seismology. (1) There is connected with the Science College a Chair of Seismology. (2) There is a Seis-mological laboratory attached to the same college where various instructive experiments are witnessed by the students from time to time. (3) A Society meets periodically at the University to discuss and devise precautionary measures against earthquakes. The seismological laboratory, or experimenting room, was opened in 1880. It now possesses a very fine set of instruments for recording earth tremors. There are seismometers at various places throughout the country where records are collected and compared. The Society mentioned above was formed in 1892, in accordance with an Imperial Order bearing on earthquake precautionary measures. The earthquake recording stations at Hitotsubashi, Fukagawa, the Tokyo Meteorological Observatory and the Imperial University are in telegraphic communication with each other, so that the velocity and other peculiarities of each earthquake can be transmitted from one station to the other instantaneously. At the Imperial University the lectures on Seismology are attended by the Geology, Civil Engineering, and Architecture students. It is said that considerable interest is taken in the subject and that investigation is carried on by the Seismological Department of the Science College in a very earnest manner. This is all very satisfactory, says the Fiji, but what we complain of is that no attempt is made by our school teachers to enlighten their pupils' minds on the subject of earthquakes, despite the fact that, owing to the volcanic nature of the islands on which we live, these phenomena so frequently invite attention. Of general knowledge on earthquakes there is next to none in this country. Hence the possibility of a panic such as took place in Tokyo a few weeks ago. What is wanted is the diffusion of such knowledge as is possessed by specialists throughout the country. The faint interest taken in a subject which so nearly concerns us by the majority of our educated men even is not very creditable to their general intelligence. The science of seismology is capable of being popularized and brought down to the comprehension of ordinary people. This will never be done by the handful of specialists engaged in scientific investigation. It must be effected by enterprising and up-to-date school teachers.

COUNT ITAGAKI.

This venerable statesman has reached the age of 70, and great preparations were made by his many friends for celebrating the occasion in what they considered a suitable manner. The newspapers utilized the occasion for reviewing the long career of the retired politician. Here is the gist of what the Kokumin Shinbun has to say about him. The very existence of this early champion of liberty is almost forgotten by the present generation of politicians. In all lines of life special honour is attached to pioneer work. The difficulties that pioneers have to overcome are so numerous and so formidable that as a rule only very earnest-minded and strong-willed men undertake this kind of work. Count Itagaki's political life may be said to have closed 16 years ago. In preparing the nation for the promulgation of the Constitution he filled a most useful function. His political views at that time were far in advance of those of most of his contemporaries. On the subject of liberty and popular rights his notions were those of the promoters of the French revolution. But while a powerful advocate of democracy, he was at the same time one of the staunchest loyalists the country possessed in the early days of the Meiji era. His extreme respect for the throne was so widely known that men listened to his speeches in favour of popular Government without taking offence. He managed to convince most of those who came into contact with him that strong attachment to the monarchy and a desire to see the nation governing itself as far as is possible are by no means incompatible sentiments. Had his partizanship been of an excessively violent type he would probably have died at the hands of an assassin. His moderation, his gentleness of manner and his quiet persuasiveness bore him safely through a turbulent period in Japan's history, through all the conflict of opinion that preceded the birth of the Constitution. Looking back to those days, the two most prominent men in the political world were Ito and Itagaki, Ito as a leader in Government ranks and Itagaki as the head of a strong, independent political party. The function filled by each statesman was different. Itagaki supplied incentives to people's minds. He instructed the unenlightened. He held up a new ideal to the nation. Ito's work was of a more practical type. He figured as the great constructor of the new form of Government. He carried into practice such of Itagaki's theories as were capable of being safely applied at that time. The work of Marquis Ito was undoubtedly in many ways far more brilliant than that of Count Itagaki and demanded for its execution greater genius than the latter statesman possesses; but at the same time Count Itagaki's labours contributed largely to the success of Marquis Ito's many political schemes. As the leader of a party Itagaki can not be said to have excelled. His natural somewhat retiring disposition unfits him for a post where strong self-assertiveness in the head alone can keep unruly members in order. The Jiyu-to was presided over by Count Itagaki in his active days, but it was led by other men. There are those who think that when Count Itagaki took to politics he mistook his calling. In 1895, just after the fall of the Okuma-Itagaki Cabinet, on a certain occasion, General Kawakami, the Chief of the Headquarters Staff, addressed Count Itagaki as follows:—"You are by nature cut out for a soldier. Had you when young followed the military profession, you would have been a Field-Marshal by this time. What a pity it was you entered the political world!" It is said that with a faint smile the Count nodded assent. It is true that his attack on Oshu at the time of the Revolution was a brilliantly successful affair. The grey-headed statesman is one of the few links with the past we have left. He must be conscious of a feeling of loneliness when he thinks of the many gaps that have been made in the circle of his friends. Goto, Mutsu, Nakajima, and many others are all at rest beneath the sod. Is it the remembrance of his lost friends or is it some other bitter experience in life that has saddened the aged Count's face so much that one of his friends, Mr. Nakae Chomin, refers to him as Hisan no Gonge, the Incarnation of Sorrow? Yet for his age the Count is still hale and active. His habits have always been simple and he is now reaping the benefits of the temperance and self-control of his earlier days. To him the evening of life seems to have many charms. Inactivity does not trouble him as it would trouble a man of a less retiring disposition. He can look out on the world's passing show with the feeling that many years ago he played a part in it, the effects of which are felt everywhere to-day. That he has ceased to exercise any influence over the political world is, it is stated, a matter of no concern to him whatever. He is neither disappointed nor restless, and still has the use of all his faculties, and being a man of great kindness of disposition and with strong personal attachments, life still yields to him many of those pleasures which alone make it bearable to any of us.

The banquet in honour of Count Itagaki's 70th birthday took place on Sunday in the Koyokan, Tokyo. Some six hundred persons, comprising eminent members of the Imperial Diet and business men, participated in the affair. Mr. Ebara Soroku delivered a congratulatory address, followed by Mr. Sugita and Mr. Matsuda. The latter gentleman in the course of his speech proposed the erection of a statue of the statesman, an idea which was warmly supported by Mr. Okura, representing the business men present. Count Itagaki rose amidst loud plaudits to respond to the congratulatory addresses. In the course of his remarks the veteran declared that he would devote his remaining years to the propagation of a social policy, for the sake of which he would return to a life of activity.

Mr. Kono finally proposed three cheers for the Count, which were enthusiastically given.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND COMMERCE.

The Jiji Shimpō, in a recent issue, says that throughout the whole of the country great umbrage has been taken at the action of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce during the past few months. Three Bills sent up to the Diet by this Department, one relating to the sale of matches, one concerning the control of habutaye bleaching places, and the other having to do with the inspection of raw silk, represent a deliberate attempt to interfere with trade and industry in what the Jiji considers to be a most unwarrantable manner. It deprecates the way in which ill-informed and inexperienced under-officials in Departments are allowed to project and draw up Bills which are calculated to excite the ridicule of the nation. As the Jiji points out, these three Bills have been handled pretty roughly by the Special Committees appointed to consider them. They have been sat on in two senses. The Raw Silk Bill in the Lower House was literally pulled to pieces. The term the Jiji used to describe the treatment it received is nigiri-tsubushi (grasped and crushed to pieces). The Habutaye Bleaching Bill was so revised in the Upper House as to lose these parts which constituted its essential framework (Kotsu-shi tomo iubeki kajo wa kogotoku sakujo serasetari). The third Bill, whose object it is to give certain match-making companies in Hyogo-ken a monopoly of the match trade, will certainly not pass this session, the Jiji says. This journal contends that by bringing forward these various measures the Department of Agriculture and Commerce is not only going the way to forfeit the confidence of the public, but it is involving a number of struggling industries in loss and disappointment of a serious kind. As an instance of the result of presenting ill-considered Bills to the Diet, the Jiji cites the match industry. Apparently deceived by the plausible promises of certain under officials of the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, a number of houses engaged in match-manufacture in Hyogoken have already made somewhat costly preparations for amalgamation. The Bill regulating the sale of matches would, if it had passed, have enabled them to do a big business with a sure prospect of substantial profits. Its rejection by the Diet, as might have been expected, has caused quite a panic in the Hyogo-ken match industry. Thus the ill-advised interference of a State Department with the progress of an important industry has only created confusion and caused waste of time and money. The public may well ask, whence come the notions that lead to the drafting of such bills as those now under consideration? Evidently from the minds of some theory-spinning ill-informed officials who fail to see the infinite harm that is done by constant meddling with trades and industries which are carried on subject to long established economic laws. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce cannot afford to pass over the recent fiascos in silence. The officials who are responsible for the presentation of these Bills ought to be severely dealt with. If this is not done, concludes the Jiji, the action of the Department will go far to bring the Saionji Cabinet into discredit and endanger its very existence. The day is past for allowing a Department to utterly ignore public opinion.

SIXTH EXCHEQUER BONDS.

Subscriptions for the Sixth Exchequer Bonds—two hundred million yen—closed on March 20th. The business done by the Bank of Japan only is as follows:—

	Subscriptions over issue price.	Subscriptions at issue price.
	yen.	yen.
Cash Subscriptions	4,113,859	198,356,850
Subscription by means of Government Bonds	1,900,750	15,737,200
	6,014,609	214,094,050

The figures make a grand total of yen 220,108,650 showing an over-subscription of twenty million yen in round numbers. The amounts offered to other banks in Tokyo and other places had not been ascertained on the closing day. Tokyo papers are of opinion that the total subscription throughout the Empire must have aggregated four hundred million yen at least.

TOKYO TRAM FARES AGITATION.

On the afternoon of March 15th, a number of socialists held a meeting—apparently a rather riotous demonstration—at the Hibiya Park, Tokyo. About fifteen hundred, including students, workmen, coolies and employees of business houses, were present. The meeting was understood to be directed against the electric railway companies which intend to raise the 3 sen uniform fare to 5 sen. Mr. T. Kato, one of the promoters, presided and said briefly that the tramway companies were assailing the public interest by trying to raise their fares and that the meeting had been called to induce them to withdraw their proposal. The declaration was received with cheers, after which the chairman displayed a placard stating that (1) the decision adopted by the Tokyo Municipal assembly in favour of the companies must be regarded as absurd; (2) the meeting should oppose the proposal of the companies to the very end; and (3) if the Government authorities give consent to the proposal of the companies, the meeting should regard the officials concerned so far from caring for the public interests as being in favour of a few private companies. The proposals of the chairman were all passed amid enthusiastic cheers. He further proposed that they should hold a demonstration in the form of a procession at 1 p.m., on March 18th between the Park and Uyeno. This was also approved unanimously. At this stage another of the promoters proposed to convey the foregoing resolutions to the Tokyo Municipal Assembly. A procession was immediately organized with a flag bearing the characters "Delegation of socialists." On the way to the Municipal Assembly, the crowd attacked the office of the Tokyo Street Tramway Co. causing serious damage to the building, and also attacked the carriage warehouse belonging to the same company. When they reached the Tokyo City Office they were dispersed by the police. Afterwards the crowd, numbering at that time over three thousand, re-assembled in the Hibiya Park. Through the efforts of the police, gendarmes, and a number of soldiers they were again dispersed without accident. Some of the leaders have been summoned to the central police office.

By way of protest against the proposal of the electric railway companies of Tokyo to raise the 3 sen uniform fare to 5 sen, about three thousand people held another meeting at Uyeno on March 18th. They displayed a banner bearing the characters "Imperial Socialism—Young Men's Party of Great Japan." They were dispersed by the police while violent speeches were made against the railway companies and the Government authorities concerned. Seven of the speakers were arrested. Two men who had been in the crowd at the park, afterwards attacked a car of the Tokyo Electric Railway at Hirokoji, near Uyeno, inflicting injuries on the conductor and causing damage to the vehicle.

The Nippon Shimbun observes in a recent issue, that the difficulty experienced by the authorities in convicting the instigators of the violent acts that were committed last September serves as an encouragement to other law-breakers to create disturbances in the metropolis. The Nippon rightly points out that the treatment of agitators who appeal to physical force and damage property requires great nicety of judgment on the part of the administrators of the law. Great severity and great laxity are both to be avoided. If all offenders of this class be punished alike and if the penalties imposed be unduly heavy, the sympathy of the public generally will be with the sufferers and thus the judicial authorities by lack of tact will in a measure be indirectly responsible for subsequent outbreaks. The management of an excited crowd by the police is not an art that can be learnt in a day. Japan is beginning to go in for the same kind of noisy demonstrations that have been resorted to principally by the lower orders in Europe and America. Big meetings of the kind that took place in Tokyo last week are constantly held in London and elsewhere. But they usually pass off without any violence at all. The London police is instructed to be very patient with the citizens on those occasions, to forbear from an appeal to physical force whenever possible. The long suffering of the police goes a great way towards appeasing the feelings of the agitators, and the police authorities hold the view that it is far better that a few constables should be stoned or beaten rather than a big disturbance should be created by active retaliation on the part of the police. It has been pointed out by some of our Japanese contemporaries that this attitude of the London police to excited citizens needs to be imitated here. It is quite certain that it would do much to remove the strong antipathy to police interference which was displayed in Tokyo last September and which still exists among certain sections of the community. The London constable is on the whole a very popular representative of the law. Many a time when in a very tight place he has been helped by private citizens quite voluntarily on their part. The general feeling among Britishers is that the English policeman is never too severe, though he may sometimes be too lenient. So the populace in England is on the side of the police when any big disturbance occurs. The Nippon Shimbun in Monday's issue, preaches in one leading article two sermons. One is to the authorities, urging them not to be over lenient or over severe in dealing with offenders and reminding them that there is a great difference between the perpetration of acts of violence, at meetings such as that held in Tokyo last week; some offenders acting on the spur of the moment, impelled by youthful love of excitement and adventure, others being guilty of wanton, deliberate cruelty and hateful malice. To the Japanese public generally the Nippon has much to say. It does not condemn demonstrations even of the kind that took place in Tokyo last week, the alleged object of which was to protest against the proposed action of the Tramway Companies in raising the fares. The socialists used the demonstration for their own purposes. According to several newspapers the original promoters of the holding of the meeting were not socialists. The original object of the calling of the meeting was a lawful one, says the Nippon, and it is a mistake to condemn such meetings. They furnish a means of giving vent to a great deal of pent up feeling in a perfectly harmless manner, as long as acts of violence are discouraged. Among the agitators on these occasions there are a large number of ordering citizens who are opposed to anything like rowdiness. It is to the interest of such people that big meetings should pass off quietly; and the Nippon urges such people to show a strong front to the promoters of violence and law-breaking. The Nippon reminds its readers that the champion of the English working man John Burns, first figured prominently before the world as the instigator of violent attacks on the London Police at a public meeting held in Trafalgar Square many years ago, for which offence he suffered close imprisonment for five months. This same John Burns has since adopted constitutional and legal methods of making his views known to the world, and has played his cards so cleverly that he now occupies a seat in the English Cabinet. The greatest triumphs of principles and opinions that the world has ever known have been obtained by peaceful methods. The teaching of Socrates, the doctrines of Christ are prized to-day the world over, while those who tried to suppress those doctrines by violence are universally condemned. Our young people must remember that peaceful methods answer best, says the Nippon, but on the other hand the authorities should be reminded that to bring a charge of taking part in an insurrection against persons who have been arrested in the act of throwing stones at a tramcar will certainly strike thoughtful people as uncalled for severity. There are many ways of explaining violent acts without resorting to the implication that their perpetrators were guilty of treason against the powers that be. Offences of the kind must be minutely inquired into. The offenders must not all be treated alike: some should be let off with a small fine; some discharged as innocent of any serious offence, and the very grave accusation of "holding an insurrectionary meeting" should not be brought against any person or persons without stronger evidence than is at present before the public, concludes the Nippon.

HABUTAYE BLEACHING BILL.

The fate of the revised bill which has been sent to the Lower House by the House of Peers is still uncertain. The Fiji Shimpō strongly advises its unequivocal rejection. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun credits the Department of Agriculture and Commerce with good motives in drafting and presenting the Bill, but is strongly of opinion that the abuses which the Bill was framed to suppress might be put down in a far better way than by seeking to pass a law that will seriously affect the further development of one of Japan's most promising industries. The notion that to get rid of dishonesty in the manufacture or preparation of goods the chief industries of a country must all be placed under direct State control is too ridiculous to need serious discussion. The Nichi Nichi thinks that the principle which underlies the new policy adopted by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce is unquestionably a mistaken one, and it holds that it is the duty of the Diet to make this plain by the treatment it gives the Habutaye Bleaching Bill. The Japanese are so fond of compromises in all matters that at the present moment it looks as though the Lower House would pass the Bill in a greatly altered form. The Fiji Shimpō thinks that the Bill is incapable of being revised so as to eliminate all elements of danger. The Bill's main aim is to put enormous power into the hands of a Minister of State. He is to be allowed to control the preparation of Habutaye to any extent he thinks fit. We all know what this means, says the Fiji, it means an infinite amount of red-tapeism, the multiplication of rules and restrictions, a hundred and one obstacles to the development of the Habutaye industry. The Bill, says this journal, cannot safely be passed in any form.

THE RAILWAY NATIONALIZATION BILL PASSED.

As already reported, the Government Bill regarding the nationalization of thirty-two private railways was brought up for debate in the Lower House of the Diet on March 16th. After lengthy arguments by both supporters and opponents the first reading was concluded. On the motion of Mr. Haseba, voting took place by ballot, the result being:—

For ..... 243
Against ..... 109

The announcement was applauded by the Government's supporters. Again on the motion of Mr. Haseba, the bill was voted upon without referring to the second and third readings. The bill was thus passed.

The following shows the details of the voting.

	Supporting.	Opposing.	Absent.	Total.
Seiyukai.....	141	—	7	148
Daido Club ...	72	—	4	76
Seiko Club.....	8	21	7	36
Progressists ...	8	84	6	98
Unaffiliated ...	14	4	2	20
	243	109	26	378

It is remarked that Mr. S. Morimoto, of the Seiyu-kai, and Mr. Y. Ozaki (Mayor of Tokyo), of the Seiko Club, were present but did not participate in the voting. Consequently they were regarded as absent. The bill for the purchase of the Seoul-Fusan Railway, was next brought in. It was unanimously passed without going through the second and third readings.

The Railway Bill created much more excitement in the House of Peers than it did in the House of Representatives. No sooner was Marquis Saionji's address finished than he and other Ministers present were accosted with a whole shower of questions. Marquis Saionji is said to display considerable tact in dealing with inquiries that are intended to be embarrassing. In the small tilt that he had with Mr. Nishimura in the House of Peers last Monday he seemed to turn aside every thrust of his opponent with consummate skill. Count Yanagizawa brought forward a motion for postponing the First Reading of the Bill, which was voted on subsequently. There were 109 votes for the postponement and only 131 against it. The Bill was then handed to a Special Committee consisting of 27 members, some of which are said to be opposed to its passing. It looks at present as though the Bill might be somewhat roughly handled by the Peers, who have shown a good deal of spirit this session in dealing with important Government Bills. Some years ago Marquis Ito was greatly embarrassed by the opposition his measures met with in the House of Peers. He had taken pains to conciliate the members of the Lower House, but seemed to think that the members of the House of Peers were a negligible quantity. But Marquis Saionji is not likely to have neglected to take precautions against formidable opposition in the Upper House.

In February, 1900, the Yamagata Cabinet made an attempt to induce the Diet to consent to the State purchase of the then existing railways. Ten years were to be allowed for effecting the purchase. The railways then indicated were the Nippon, the Nishinari, the Hokkaido-Tanko, the Hoku-yetsu, the Kobu, the Kwansei, the Sanyo the Kyushu and the Kyoto lines. Their total purchase price was not to exceed 200 million yen. The Government Bill for the purchase of the railways was outvoted in the Lower House. But, as the Nichi Nichi points out, considerable interest is attached to the debate which took place on that occasion, because it happened that the very point which led to the resignation of Mr. Kato, the compulsory sale of the lines by their owners, was brought up for discussion in the House of Representatives, and the Cabinet of that day took an entirely different view as to the rights of private owners to that adopted by the present Saionji Cabinet. On this subject the Nichi Nichi of Monday last publishes an extract from the official record of the Proceedings of the House of Representatives on February 16th, 1900. We furnish a literal and accurate translation of the dialogue that took place in the Lower House between Dr. Hatoyama and Mr. Sakatani, the present Minister of Finance, who was then a Government Delegate attached to the Department of Finance.

Dr. Hatoyama—The replies which the Government Delegate has given to my questions have in various respects made things clear to me, but in order to be quite sure that I understand the position which the Government takes in the intended purchase of the railways, I wish to trouble the Government delegate with another question. Hitherto I have been of opinion that in introducing this Bill the Government took the ground that it is absolutely necessary that the lines now owned by private companies should become State property, that the State must have them at all costs, that they cannot be left in the hands of their present owners under any consideration, but now Mr. Sakatani has told us that the Government is ready to purchase if the owners of the lines are prepared to sell, but if the owners object to sell, then the Government can not go any further. This is what I understood you to say, Sir; am I right?

Mr. Sakatani—As this Bill contains no stipulation compelling owners of railways to sell their property, if they object to sell we are powerless to do anything. If they say that at no price we can offer will they sell us the lines, then as far as such lines are concerned this Bill gives us no right to do anything. The only alternative in that case would be for us to construct parallel lines to compete with these private railways.

Dr. Hatoyama—How would it be to alter the Bill somewhat? If the Government is of opinion that the State should own all the country's railways, then they should introduce a Bill which will insure their getting possession of them all. For the Government to say that if the owners object there is nothing to be done seems to me very unsatisfactory. The Government will purchase if it can, if it can not then never mind. This is a very half hearted kind of policy. To be told this makes one doubt whether the Government thinks the purchase to be absolutely necessary. The Government seems to say simply: "It would be nice to get the lines if we can, but if we can not, then they can remain in the hands of their present owners." Has the Government no strong convictions on the point? Do they think it absolutely essential that they should have the railways?

Mr. Sakatani—This was brought up at a meeting of the Special Committee—

Dr. Hatoyama—I do not want to know what any members of that committee think on the subject, I am asking you as a Government Delegate to tell me what were the convictions of the Government when they presented this Bill to the Diet.

Mr. Sakatani—Seifu no kakushin desu ka. Sore wa kyohaku (脅迫) baishu to iu koto wa hanahada Kaisha no kitokuken wo gai shite yoroshikunai to iu ron ga dandan ate Seifu ni oite mo sono giron wo ze nari to mitomete, kyohaku baishu wa Senu koto ni kesshinmashita. Is it the convictions of the members of the Cabinet you inquire about? Well, as for the compulsory sale of the railways, it was contended by a good many people that the adoption of such a course, in that it would involve a violation of rights already granted to private companies, would be wrong. The Government recognized the validity of this argument and decided that there should be no compulsory sales.

GENERAL STOESSEL.

A Washington telegram which we reproduced on March 20th from the Hochi Shimbun said:

The trial of General Stoessel by court-martial has begun. The General asked that the Court should obtain the attendance of a staff officer of General Nogi, Commander of the investing Army at Port Arthur, in order to ascertain how gallantly the Russians fought during the siege.

In connexion with this report, an officer—apparently a member of the staff of the army under the command of General Baron Nogi—is alleged by the same Tokyo paper to have said that no request had been made to Japan by Russia for any expression of opinion as to the extent of the gallantry displayed by the Russian army during the siege, and that no instance existed in history of a nation obtaining the attendance of an officer of a former enemy to tender such testimony. The Japanese officer went on to say that as an individual, he was earnestly desirous of giving either by telegram or letter an opinion as to the fighting at Port Arthur, but there was no clause in International Law with regard to attending personally at a court-martial in another country. General Stoessel was the commander of the Kwantung fortifications and General Smirnof, commander of the Port Arthur fortress. At the outset, General Stoessel proposed surrender, but General Smirnof insisted on carrying on the conflict to the bitter end. On the day of surrender, food-stuffs in store were sufficient to support the garrison for several months longer and ammunition was being smuggled from Tientsin. When the Russians surrendered, the first line only was occupied by the Japanese. If the Russians had held stubbornly to their second and third lines, they would have postponed the fate of the stronghold for two or three months. The most important question was why the Russians did not hold out for two or three months longer—a question not referable to humane considerations but solely to reasons of strategy. Suppose that the Russians had not surrendered when they did and maintained the struggle longer, the investing army under General Baron Nogi would not have been able to participate in the battle of Mukden or to make its effective attack upon the Russian right wing. Consequently final success in this battle could not have been confidently anticipated. Even if the battle had still been favourable to Japan in the absence of the Port Arthur army, greater difficulties would have been experienced than those actually met. On this view of the stake at issue General Stoessel must be tried by his judges. The speaker, in conclusion, however, said that he had no hesitation in eulogizing the gallantry of the Russians at Port Arthur.

WESTERN POWERS AND CHINA.

A correspondent writes:—China, for certain manifest reasons, is not implicitly trusted by any of the Western Powers. But the amount of distrust felt in the different countries, on the supposition that the action of Governments embody national feeling—a somewhat risky assumption—is by no means the same. The American Government expects an outbreak some time this Summer and makes no secret of the despatch of troops to the Philippines to be ready for an emergency. Germany, on the other hand, is busily engaged in withdrawing her troops, leaving only about 700 at Peking and Tientsin. France and England have made no special preparations for suppressing a big disturbance, probably relying on their fleets to supply good strong contingents for land warfare. Seamen are usually good fighters on shore, and when it comes to scaling walls and hand-to-hand combats out-do landmen. In an article on the outlook in China and the attitude of Western Powers, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun says that the feeling in Washington is that America is going to save the situation. Russia cannot be relied on, as a big burst-up in China would be all to her advantage, enabling her to push more than one of her pet schemes. England, France and Germany are represented by certain American publicists to be too jealous of each other to co-operate against China. As for Japan, for the present she is said to have had enough of war. She is absorbed in the elaboration of extensive post-bellum measures, and fresh outlays on behalf of the maintenance of order in China would not be willingly made by her. There is much anti-American feeling in China, but if America stepped in with her troops at the right moment and suppressed a formidable insurrection, her friendship for China would be proved beyond all doubt and the way would be opened, it is said, for that big commercial development in the Far East which American business men so desire. But it is only fair to state that whatever meaning may be attached to America's action by other Powers and by some of her own politicians, the Washington Government has asserted that the despatch of troops to the Philippines has no other object in view than the protection of American citizens residing in China in the event of a general anti-foreign outbreak in that country. As to the probability of a rising, America alone is very confident that the situation is fraught with danger. England, judging only from the recent consular reports sent to her Foreign Office, is uncertain what to think. Germany would hardly act as she is doing did she believe her subjects were in imminent peril. France is quietly watching the situation, with a good deal of anxiety on account of the unpopularity of French missionaries in certain provinces. The notion that were there a call for intervention, Japan would be backward in co-operating with Occidental Powers cannot be entertained for a moment. Situated as things in China are to-day the loss of any of the prestige Japan has won would be fatal to her. She dare not allow any Western Power to step in ahead of her. Our opinion is that if America should have occasion to send a few regiments to China, they will not be there many weeks before they are joined by a big contingent from Japan. It must always be remembered, too, that Japan has to-day in Manchuria and Korea sufficient men to deal with any sudden emergency prior to the arrival of reinforcements from this country. Japan of all Powers can afford to view the situation calmly. The Japanese are to-day far more popular throughout China than Occidentals. If an anti-foreign rising does take place the populace will not treat the Japanese as they treat Europeans and Americans, and so Japan's intervention would certainly be the pouring of oil on troubled waters. Many of the Japanese soldiers seem to have come back with the notion that their services will be required in China again before many years are past. This may be a mere idle conjecture or, on the other hand, it may be based on minute knowledge of the real situation in China, of which the Japanese are far better judges than any Western nation.

OBITUARY.

Shanghai papers announce the death on March 12th of Mr. Peter Sys, who for many years had a large medical practise in tropical diseases, particularly sprue, for which he was supposed to possess an infallible specific. Many times he was offered large sums for his secret but he steadily refused to disclose it. Several foreign residents of Japan undoubtedly benefited by his course of treatment.

The death took place on Saturday night or Sunday morning of Mr. T. B. Glover, Jun., who has been staying at the Club Hotel. Mr. Glover, who was a relative of the Glover family so well-known in Japan, was on his way home to England. He expired suddenly from heart failure. The remains will be cremated and sent to Nagasaki.

Mr. K. Misaki, formerly Vice-President of the Yokohama Specie Bank, died on March 15th at his villa in Kamakura. He had been ill for some time with cancer of the stomach. In recognition of his services during the late war, the Emperor, previous to his death, conferred on him the Fourth Class of the Rising Sun. His loss is greatly deplored by the foreign business community.

It is with great regret (remarks the Seoul Press Weekly) that we record the death of the Rev. R. A. Sharp, a Canadian, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Mission (North) in Korea. Mr. Sharp, who was 33 years of age, died at Kong-Ju, on Monday last, the 5th inst, from typhus fever which is now prevalent throughout the province. It appears that Mr. Sharp was out on his circuit when taken ill. He succeeded in reaching his home on the fourth day, but in so weak a condition that it was necessary to tie him to the saddle of the pony he rode. Mrs. Sharp was at this time also itinerating in an opposite direction, and owing to some delay on the part of the messenger sent to re-call her, she did not reach her husband's side for three days. The Rev. Dr. Scranton arrived the next day—that being the eighth day of the fever—and on the next day a nurse (Miss Edmonds) was sent from Seoul, but in spite of all their skill and attention Mr. Sharp succumbed to the attack, passing away at 6.45 on the 5th inst. He was temporarily interred at Kong-Ju. The deceased gentleman has only been in Korea about three years, marrying shortly after his arrival in this country, Miss Alice M. Hammond of the W.F.M.S. Mr. and Mrs. Sharp were indefatigable missionaries, and devoted to their work among the Koreans. Much sympathy is felt for the latter in her sad bereavement, and the mission has lost an earnest and devoted worker. We understand that a disease resembling typhus fever in some of its features, but which the natives call cholera, has of late been raging in the neighbourhood in which Mr. Sharp worked.

DISASTROUS EARTHQUAKE IN FORMOSA.

On March 17th, two severe shocks of earthquake were felt at Kagi, Formosa, and the surrounding districts. Several hundred houses collapsed and about eight hundred persons were killed or injured.

A Taipeh telegram to the Nichi Nichi says that owing to the earthquake, the railway was entirely destroyed and telegraph poles have fallen. Consequently there are no detailed reports from the devastated districts. It is added that the whole of the buildings in Baishiko and Shiniko totally collapsed.

Information with regard to the disastrous earthquake which occurred in Formosa on March 17th are now given from official sources.

All the buildings in Dabyo, Kagi, collapsed, 516 persons were killed and 396 injured.

In the districts of Baishiko, Shinko, etc., many houses were destroyed, and a great number of people were killed or injured.

At Toroku, 94 houses collapsed and 140 were damaged. Eleven persons were killed and 25 injured.

At Yensuiko, one person was killed and another injured. Further damage was still being investigated.

The severe shocks were continuous from 6.40 a.m. on March 17th to the following evening.

It is added that in Toroku 30 houses collapsed; 50 including the local government offices were partially damaged; three persons were killed and three severely injured.

In Kagi about a hundred buildings were destroyed and fifty persons including two convicts were killed or injured.

The same day, an earthquake was felt in Japan.

In Karatsu, it was felt at 9 p.m. on the 17th; in Nagano, at 9.15 p.m. the same day, and in Kumamoto there were five shocks between the evening of the 17th and the following morning.

A Taipeh telegram to the Asahi gives further details of the casualties arising from the earthquake in Formosa, by which it appears that in the Kagi jurisdiction 1,400 buildings were destroyed and 650 partially damaged; 1,014 persons were killed and 695 more or less injured.

Official investigations made on March 19th as to the casualties in connection with the earthquake in Formosa give the following results:—

	Persons Jurisdiction. killed.	Persons injured.	Houses collapsed.	Houses damaged.
Kagi .....	142	184	823	996
Dabyo .....	647	483	605	36
Shinko .....	107	166	618	414
Baishiko .....	176	5,272	432	80

Bokushikyoku.	1	6	52	7
Tenshiko .....	1	3	63	39
Total .....	1,076	6,129	2,677	1,634

The railway between Kagi and Toroku was greatly affected but repairs have been completed, and traffic has been re-opened.

A Taipeh telegram to the Jiji says that the results of the disaster, with the exception of those in Toroku and Yensuiko was: 1,058 persons killed; 5,000 injured; 2,629 houses destroyed; and 27,430 damaged.

In sympathy with the distress of the people the Emperor has decided to send an official of the Imperial Court to South Formosa.

A caving-in of the earth has occurred in the neighbourhood of Baishiko near Kagi. The depth is about four feet and the length about two miles.

KOREA.

A Seoul telegram under date of March 17th says that the Korean Government has concluded a contract with the Nippon Industrial Bank for a loan of ten million yen bearing interest of 6½ per cent. The loan realised to Korean Government 90 per 100. Of the total, five million yen will be handed over by the Japanese bank before the end of March and the remainder subsequently whenever required by the Korean Finance Department. The loan will be redeemed within ten years. The security is the Customs. The Korean Government intends to employ the money for the purpose of encouraging industries.

Marquis Ito, Resident-General, received on March 16th the British, American, German, French, Chinese and Belgian Consuls at his office. He will entertain them on the evening of March 24th at his official residence.

Mr. Li Hwan-yong, Minister for Education, intends to employ Japanese teachers in four out of the nine schools in Seoul as a first step for the encouragement of primary education. The Minister is consulting Mr. Shidehara, Japanese educational adviser to the Department.

An Imperial Edict has been proclaimed prohibiting any wedding until the selection of a Consort for the Crown Prince.

On March 15th, about sixty rioters created a disturbance at Hong-Ju, in South Chhung-Chhong, in which the guards of the rural division joined. Subsequently they made an attack on the local branch office of the Il Ching-hoi. On the 17th, a number of Japanese police and gendarmes proceeded to the place from Koang-Ju, and Swiwon. Later, a scheme to foment a riot at Koang-Ju was detected and three of the ringleaders were arrested by the Japanese gendarmes. The others fled.

The military telegraph, over eighteen hundred miles in length, is to be handed over to the Department of Communications on March 20th.

General Li Keung-thaik, Minister for War, who is undergoing treatment in the Seoul Hospital (Japanese) on account of injuries recently inflicted on him by two men, is reported to have recovered. He will leave the hospital about March 22nd.

The trouble at Hon-ju in South Chhung-chhong has been settled by Japanese gendarmes and police. Twenty-three of the ringleaders were arrested.

As the result of the abolition of the Foreign Office, Mr. D. W. Stevens, American adviser to the Department, was released from service. Since then he has been attending the Bureau of the Foreign Affairs in the Imperial Court. It is said that he will act as adviser to the Residency-general in addition to his present post.

General Baron Hasegawa, Commander of the guards in Korea, will leave for Tokyo in order to be present at the military review to be held on April 30th.

During February, the income of the Seoul-Wiju Railway was an average of six yen per mile per day, the maximum being yen 7.69 and the minimum yen 4.39.

In connexion with the disturbance in South Chhung-Chhong, the commander of the garrison at Swiwon gives further details. It appears that on March 13th, Mr. Ming Chonghyok, formerly a Councillor of the Cabinet, started an anti-Japanese agitation at Telhin in Koan-ju district for the alleged purpose of recovering from the Japanese the control of foreign affairs. He and his supporters sent letters to foreign diplomatic officials asking for assistance in their efforts. A number of Japanese gendarmes were sent to the place where the agitators had collected, and dispersed them. Thirty-six uniforms and three hundred packages of ammunition were seized, and the dwelling of the ringleader, Mr. Ming Chonghyok, was searched, eight rifles being found.

Some native agitators have been guilty of outrages in the districts of Chongsan and Tienchong. A force of police was despatched thither and the rioters were at once dispersed, many of them escaping in the direction of Hon-ju.

Lieut.-General Haraguchi, Commander of the Thirteenth Division, and Lieut.-General Okihara, Commander of the Fifteenth Division, will arrive on March 24th in Seoul to be present at the meeting of officers commanding in the peninsula.

The following notes are from the Seoul Press Weekly of March 17th:—

The formal opening of the new Residency-General will take place on March 28th.

The personal friends of Bishop Corfe will be interested to learn that he is now on a return journey to the Far East. He will probably proceed to Peking and, for some time, assist Bishop Scott in the work of his Diocese.

It is stated that from the recent loan obtained from the Japanese Government, (of yen 1,500,000) the Korean Financial Office have advanced up to the present time the sum of yen 600,000 to the Note Association, the Seoul Warehouse Company, and the District Warehouse Company. Now, however, the Finance Office, being in need of ready money, withdrew yen 200,000 from the deposits in the Dai Ichi Ginko on March 14th.

It is rumoured that some Japanese capitalists in Seoul, in conjunction with a company in Tokyo, intend to establish a Motor Car Company in this city, for the purpose chiefly, we understand, of transporting goods.

It is reported that Mr. Pak-Ki-Yang, an ex-Cabinet Minister, was arrested on March 12th by the Korean Police on suspicion of being concerned in the Sim-Sang-Houn question and in the attack upon the late Minister of War. Mr. Pak-Ki-Yang was committed to the Supreme Court.

It is said that the sum of yen 30,000 has been bestowed upon Prince Eiu-Wha, who is now in Japan, by the Korean Emperor, in order to defray the expenses of education and travelling incurred whilst the prince was residing in America, which have been outstanding for some considerable period.

His Majesty the Korean Emperor, who has the welfare of his people at heart is said to have issued an Imperial Edict on Mar. 11th expressing his sympathy with them in their need. The Cabinet Ministers were to issue instructions to the local Governors and district officials, prohibiting any acts of coercion towards the people. Miscellaneous taxes in various districts which were actually being collected without recognition by the Government should be strictly forbidden.

At the recent audience with the Korean Emperor, the Resident-General is said to have stated to his Majesty his views relating to the administration and the advancement and improvement of Agriculture, Industry, Commerce and Education, which after consultation with the Cabinet Ministers he proposes to put into execution, and requested the sanction of the Emperor. His Majesty approved of the intended reforms and acceded to the Marquis' demands. After the audience the Emperor summoned the Premier, Mr. Pak and the other Cabinet Ministers and informed them of the purpose of the audience with the Resident-General and exhorted them to follow and accept his advice in all matters of administration.

On March 13th at 6 p.m. the Ministers of Finance and for Home Affairs were received in audience by the Emperor, and they then stated to His Majesty the principal points discussed at the recent banquet given by Marquis Ito to the Cabinet Ministers, the summary of which is as follows:—"That the present Cabinet Ministers being entirely in the confidence of the Emperor, and being men of ability, shall endeavour to preserve unity in the Council and forward all measures conducive to their country's welfare. That with regard to reforms in administration, all stringent measures to be avoided. Reforms to be gradually introduced. That the Government's policy shall be, to advance in every way the development of agriculture, industry and commerce, and in order to meet the necessary expense which will be incurred in carrying out these measures, a certain sum of money shall be borrowed from the Japanese Government or from banking companies. To all of these propositions the Korean Emperor gave a cordial assent.

During some special services held recently in one of the largest cities in Korea a highwayman confessed to having made that his profession. "Now I have decided to believe in Christ what must I do?" he asked of the missionary. He was told that the only thing that he ought to do was to go to the Magistrate and make confession. This he did and the Magistrate, remarking that this was a wonderful thing, ordered him to be detained in a warm room. He told the man that though he would have been beheaded if caught, now that he had made confession he would not execute capital punishment without first referring the matter to the Governor of the Province. The Governor wrote back that never before in the history of Korea had there been such an experience as a criminal making voluntary confession of crime and therefore in this special case the man should be pardoned. When the Magistrate called the man up before him, he gave him some fatherly advice and told him that he was very gratified to find that there was a religion that would so change the hearts of men as to cause them to do what he had done. In addition to mere words the Magistrate gave him a present of four dollars to pay for the rice he had eaten during the few days of his detention. In the face of such an incident as the above can it be said that there are no true converts?

THE FUTURE OF SAGHALIN.

The Nichi Nichi says that there are about five hundred Russians in South Saghalien. Many of these are convicts and are engaged in agricultural work. They are desirous of leaving for home as they believe their term of banishment expired when the territory was transferred to Japan. Their departure will consequently take place in the not distant future, after which all the industries in this part of the island will fall into the hands of the Japanese.

A writer in the Russian press draws attention to the change in the aspect of affairs in the northern half of the island of Saghalin, owing to the fact that the southern half is occupied by the Japanese. He is afraid that the Japanese, with their well-known energy, will develop the mineral wealth of their possession (coal, naphtha, iron, &c.), and will supply all the Amur region, thus accomplishing the economic conquest of Eastern Siberia. As a remedy for this the writer suggests inviting foreign, chiefly American capital, for working the alleged enormous mineral wealth of the northern part, and urges that it would be easily attracted if the island were properly colonised, and a proper steamship service arranged. In his opinion, all concessions ought to be coupled with the condition that all labour employed should be Russian. Commercial Intelligence points out that the writer forgets that one of the chief reasons why it is difficult to get foreign capital for Russian business is the want of certainty, while numerous administrative restrictions and abuses (the condition as to the employment of Russians being one of them) make it most difficult for a foreigner to carry on business at a profit in Russia. There is no doubt that, as soon as Russia is in a more settled condition, and the arbitrary power of the administration is broken, foreign capital will flow into Russia, which will be a rich and extensive field for all kinds of business.

The Imperial Body Guards will take part in a funeral service on April 14th at Aoyama Cemetery in honour of officers and men who died in the war. These number a little over six thousand. This official rite which was fixed to take place on March 17th, was postponed owing to the appearance of contagious disease in a regiment belonging to the Division.

FRENCH MERCHANT MARINE.

Some interesting statistics were quoted in the course of a debate in the French Chamber on a new Merchant Shipping Bill. During the last twenty-five years the French Merchant Marine has increased by sixty-one ships; and notwithstanding the hundreds of millions paid as bounties, the tonnage, which was 1,037,000 tons in 1875, was but 1,000 tons more in 1900. So much for the ships. The bankruptcy of the system is apparent; and no wonder, in face of such results, the French Chamber was a little shy about continuing the present arrangements. Not only have the construction bounties failed to accomplish the purpose for which they were intended, but the navigation bounties have proved equally fruitless. The figures given in the Chamber are instructive. In that part of the French carrying trade open to competition, French ships carried in 1875 29 per cent. of the merchandise entering and leaving the country; in 1900 the proportion was but 20 per cent. If the whole of the carrying trade of France be considered, the results are: In 1875, 37 per cent.; in 1900, 28 per cent. But there is another point of importance. If the composition of the French commercial fleet be analysed, it is seen that 55 per cent. of the imports and exports carried under the French flag is transported by sailing vessels. So that the only result of the bounties during the last thirty years has been not only to maintain the French merchant marine in a stationary condition, but to encourage the construction of sailing ships, while all the maritime nations of the world have been abandoning sail for steam.

Referring in his consular report on Indo-China to the new scheme of mail shipping service which the French Government have been considering, Mr. G. W. Pearson, the British Consul, states that it is proposed to do away with the Marseilles-Australian line and that to Bombay, and to reduce gradually the subsidy on the Saigon-Shanghai line. By way of substitutes there will be a new line from Saigon to Sydney via Singapore, Batavia, Noumea, and Brisbane, and another monthly service, in addition to those now established, between Marseilles and Saigon. The latter service will be extended to Tonkin until railway facilities have been provided, when the subsidy for this extension will be unnecessary. Then a weekly line may be run between Marseilles and Saigon. It is, however, very probable, Mr. Pearson thinks, that the scheme detailed above will be found impracticable. It will probably be necessary to supplement the line of mail boats by a service of large steamers running between Lyons and Marseilles to Shanghai and Canton, in view of the expected increase of trade between China and France. A project for a subsidised line between Tourane and Swatow, Foochow, Shanghai, Manila, Osaka and Yokohama is on foot. The success of such a line must depend upon the improvement made in the ports of Tourane and Saigon, which need new docks and godowns, coal yards and rice depots.

THE FAMINE.

Mr. Huntington Wilson, the American Chargé d'Affaires, has just handed over to His Excellency the Minister for Foreign Affairs, an additional sum of 100,500 yen for the relief of the famine sufferers in the north.

This generous contribution from the American public has been collected by the Christian Herald of New York, which has been most active in its efforts in support of President Roosevelt's appeal to the people of the United States for this philanthropic object. This sum, like those previously sent, in the collection of which the Christian Herald has so largely aided, is transmitted through the Red Cross Association to be expended for food exclusively.

This contribution is the eighth remittance for famine relief that has been transmitted through the American Legation, the total sum up to the present date amounting to yen 200,900.00.

Reports from Fukushima say that in connexion with the famine distress, some two hundred people held a meeting in the compound of the Shinto shrine Kajima Jinsha in the village of Shintono, Adachi district. One of the crowd, made a speech in which he dwelt upon the negligence of the head man of the village in respect of measures for relieving the starving people. As there were signs of disorder the police from the Nihonmatsu station quelled them and dispersed the demonstration.

In the village of Nagaoka, Date district, several tens of villagers armed with hatchets, sickles, etc., attempted to attack the village office, being dissatisfied with the steps taken by the office for relieving distress. They also were dispersed by the police.

A dispute has occurred between land-owners and poor people in the village of Sakuro, Shinobu district. On March 17th the latter complained to the Fukushima Police Office against the land-owners. Matters are now quiet.

The happy suggestion of Mrs. Winfield, on hearing that three yen was the average sum given monthly to assist a destitute family in the famine section, that as many ladies as desired to do so should each undertake the relief of one family for six months, has proved a most helpful one.

Twenty ladies are contributing sixty-six yen monthly, and intend to do so until harvest time, to the relief of twenty-two families. The money is sent to the foreign treasurer, and by him disbursed. This is besides the twenty families whose relief is undertaken by the "King's Daughters," and the lunch provided for ten children by the Union Church Sunday School.

About a month ago, oppressed by the sufferings of the children, the Sendai Committee expressed a strong desire that a Home be started for them in Sendai. Miss Phelps, formerly a missionary in Sendai, and but recently returned from America, went by request to see if the scheme could be carried out.

She had hardly arrived when the children came flocking in to the number, at last accounts, of fifty-one. Some of them were neatly clad, but most were in rags that could only be thrown away or burned as soon as replaced.

Ten of the subscribers to distressed families preferred to have their money go to the children, if the Sendai Committee thought best, and it is so arranged.

They have been provided with funon through the kind gift of the Yokohama-Tokyo Foreign Residents Committee and the clothing now there or on the way from Yokohama, of which the orphanage has first choice, will nearly, if not quite, provide clothing for those now in. What the next applicants are to do, we do not know, but there are many kind hearts and none will be turned away, of that we are sure.

Baron Erckert, German Chargé d'Affaires, and Mr. Homann manager of the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank, were received by Marquis Saionji on Wednesday. Mr. Homann informed the Premier that he had been ordered by his head office in Berlin and connected German banks, to contribute yen 25,000 for the relief of the sufferers in the famine districts in North Japan. Marquis Saionji expressed the thanks of the Japanese nation and said that he would report the contribution to His Majesty the Emperor.

Fifty thousand dollars was remitted on March 16th by the Christian Herald as donations by the public on behalf of the famine sufferers in Japan. The successive remittances now aggregate eighty thousand dollars.

Princes Fushimi, Arisugawa, Kan-in, Higashi-Fushimi, Kwacho, Yamashina, Kayo, Kuni, Nashimoto, and Kita-Shirakawa have contributed one thousand yen each for the relief of people suffering from the famine.

Previous to the departure, Lord Redesdale donated fifty pounds sterling towards the fund for relieving the distressed people.

The following cablegram from the Lord Mayor of Melbourne to Sir Malcolm McEacharn, who is now in Tokyo, has been kindly placed at our disposal:—

Please communicate to the Minister of Foreign Affairs that the citizens of Victoria deeply sympathise with the sufferers by the famine. We have remitted £800, half the amount being from Government balance, as first instalment of contributions from citizens. Weedon.

Colonel Wood, late Military Attaché to the American Legation, has sent to the Sendai Famine Relief Committee the sum of 6,030 yen collected in the Pacific Coast States. He is endeavouring to raise more for the relief fund.

The Executive Committee of the Yokohama and Tokyo Foreign Residents' Association for Relief of Sufferers by the War gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following sums towards the Famine Relief Fund now being collected:—

	Yen.
Amount already acknowledged ...	8,734.10
General Kelly-Kenny .....	200.00
Admiral Sir Edward Seymour .....	200.00

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—During the last voyage of the Mongolia from San Francisco, a collection was taken for the famine sufferers in Northern Japan and the money was entrusted to me to hand to those having relief work in charge. I promised that I would state in the columns of your paper just the use to which the money was put. In accordance with that promise I now report that the money (yen 104.28) was sent to "The Foreign Committee of Relief" at Sendai, and I have their receipt for the same.

Thanking you in advance for inserting this statement,

I am, Yours sincerely, T. C. WINN.
Osaka, March 19th, 1906.

OPENING OF THE IMPERIAL LIBRARY.

A public library known as the Teikoku Zushokwan was opened in Tokyo on Tuesday. This library was first designed to serve as a memorial of Japan's victories in the war with China, but its construction has proceeded so slowly that it is only to-day that it can be opened and even now it is by no means complete. The main building is 4 stories high and the building set apart for the storing of books 9 stories high. The cost of the structure is stated to be 320,000 yen. The Nippon says the Library will now serve as a Memorial of two great wars. Compared with the magnificent libraries of the West, it seems to the Nippon very insignificant, but Japan is only just beginning to feel the value of such institutions as public libraries.

The wife of a barber named J. Narita, residing at Negishi, Yokohama, committed suicide on March 12th by shooting herself in the forehead with a revolver which is said to have been purchased the previous day at the Kanamara shop. Jealousy is reported to have been the cause.

VLADIVOSTOCK.

About three hundred Japanese, including sixty women, are now in Vladivostock. Many of them deal in vegetables and others in curios. The Russian military authorities are said to have set aside some ten cars on the Siberian Railway for the carriage of merchandise to the interior for business purposes. For the use of the cars, says the Asahi's correspondent, large bribes are needed, as is usual in Russian official methods. The delivery of post and telegraph matter is always delayed for five to seven days, which causes merchants much loss. Some Japanese made a complaint to the Russian Telegraph Office as to the delay but they could not obtain any definite explanation from the director.

The number of soldiers at Vladivostock is reported to be thirty thousand. At night soldiers and police are on guard in the streets and when they find a new comer, they follow him watching him closely. Chinamen are often found dead in the streets, killed by these guards. Besides the Japanese and Chinese in the city there are six or seven Germans and about ten Greeks.

Owing to the freedom of the harbour from ice many foreign merchantmen are arriving at Vladivostock and the prosperity of the city is being restored. It is reported that General Mischenko, Military Commander, is using harsh measures towards the revolutionaries.

According to the Dalini Vostock, of Vladivostock, Generals Kuropatkin and Linevitch have returned home from the front. General Gradevoff, formerly Commander of the Army in the Amur district, has been appointed to command the armies still in Manchuria. It is rumoured, says the Jiji's Vladivostock correspondent, that General Kuropatkin will be appointed Viceroy in the Far East.

SUGAR DUTY BILL.

Prominent sugar traders of Yokohama have jointly published views opposing the Government's bill regarding the revision of the sugar duty, which is now under the consideration of a Special Committee of the Lower House.

In this context, it may be stated that the amended duty and the consumption tax are as follows:—

Series.	Duty, per 100 kin. yen.	Consumption Tax. yen.	Total. yen.
1 .....	1.65	2.00	3.65
2 .....	3.00	4.40	7.40
3 .....	0.74.6	6.50	7.24.6
4 .....	0.82.7	7.50	8.32.7

The duty in the 3rd and 4th series is conventional.

THE BRITISH EMBASSY.

The Jiji says that Sir Claude MacDonald, G.C.M.G., K.C.B., British Ambassador, will start for home in June on leave.

Mr. George H. Barclay, C.M.G., Counsellor of the British Embassy, has been appointed to a similar post in Constantinople. He will leave Japan by (Japan Mail) believe on March 30.

His many friends will learn with great pleasure that Mr. Pet. Peacock, of the British Embassy, has been appointed M.V.O. (Member of the Victorian Order), an honour which is well deserved and which will no doubt be appreciated by its recipient.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

In connexion with the proposed mutually favourable commercial convention between Japan and America, the Tokyo Economical Society, which has been investigating the matter, issued recently the opinions arrived at by its special committee. The Committee advises the drawing up without delay of a special treaty; to exempt from duty flour and wheat arriving from America, and to endeavour to obtain a decrease in the American duties on Japanese habutaye, kaiki silk, silk handkerchiefs and fancy matting of 30 per cent. on an average. The Hochi, commenting on such a scheme, warmly endorses the opinions expressed by the Committee.

The following figures shows the per centage of business done by three leading Japanese raw silk exporters:—

	Raw Silk Co. Bales.	Mitsui Bussan Kaisha. Bales.	Doshin Kaisha. Bales.	Total. Bales.	Per centage.
1900 ...	9,113	4,214	1,793	66,597	22½
1901 ...	10,107	4,318	2,170	71,456	23
1902 ...	12,514	6,254	2,162	76,327	27
1903 ...	11,756	6,543	2,022	74,567	26
1904 ...	17,619	11,550	2,029	92,782	30
1905 ...	12,054	7,594	1,452	57,308	37

Investigation for the 1905 fiscal year—from April 1st, 1905, to March 31st, 1906—are not yet completed but on the supposition that as last year showed an increase of 37 per cent. then last year's trade should show a further increase of 13 per cent., this would leave but 50 per cent. of the raw silk export trade in the hands of foreign merchants.

There is a suggestion that, with a view to promote the welfare of the Japanese colony in London, a club should be formed, together with a Chamber of Commerce. It has been recognised for some time, says the Pall Mall Gazette, that such an institution is desirable, as there is no place in the city where the Japanese might meet to discuss their affairs, while it is evident that the creation of a Chamber of Commerce would facilitate the development of business relations between the two peoples and their respective countries. The necessity is the greater, writes a correspondent, because of the fact that "London is being employed more and more by the Japanese as a 'clearing centre' for their commerce with the Continent and the United States, and what might profit the subjects of the Mikado living and working in our midst should also profit our own merchants and bankers."

Prince Ferdinando of Italy, nephew of the Queen-Dowager, who is now in Manila, will arrive in Japan at the end of March or the beginning of April in a warship of the Italian squadron. The Japanese Imperial Court will receive him as a national guest. His Highness is twenty-two years old. The Nichi Nichi adds that the father of the Prince paid visits to Japan in 1875, 1879, and 1881.

Lieut.-General Matsunaga, Commander of the Third Division who is still undergoing treatment in a field hospital at Mukden, and whose condition was recently reported as serious, appears to have improved considerably, for it is now stated that he will leave for home on March 21st.

Last year a new Regulation was issued by the Department of Justice to the effect that from this year onwards, for at least 3 years, at the first examinations held for Public Procurators, Judges and Advocates the candidates would have to pass in one foreign language. This naturally caused a great commotion in the Law Schools of Tokyo, and gave a great impetus to the study of European tongues in those institutions. But as the new regulation was sprung on them very suddenly, the heads of the Law Schools agitated for its repeal on the ground that in Japanese Law Courts all the proceedings are conducted in Japanese and that therefore it is not absolutely necessary that Law officers should know a foreign language. They also pointed out that among the Regulations respecting the conduct of judicial business in the Courts there is one which expressly says that "all legal business shall be carried on through the medium of the Japanese language only." While the above Regulation remains unrescinded it is inconsistent, said the Heads of the Law Schools, to require candidates for office under the Crown to pass examinations in foreign tongues. The Minister of Justice, impressed by the cogency of this argument, rescinded the former order of the Department, which required the holding of examinations in Foreign Languages during the years 1906, 1907 and 1908. The above particulars are taken from the Official Gazette of March 16th.

It is officially reported that Dr. Figueroa Alcora, Vice-President of the Argentine Republic, has been elected President in succession to Dr. Manuel Quintana who died the other day.

Official funeral services took place on March 18th at Yokosuka in honour of officers and men belonging to the station who died during the war. General Prince Kan-in, Commander of the First Division, read the Saimun. Admiral Kamimura, Commander of the station, and other officers were present.

On March 19th, the Tokyo Electric Light Co. held a general meeting. A proposal to raise a foreign loan of five hundred thousand sterling was introduced. The essential terms of the loan were stated as follows: price of issue 92 ½%; interest 5 per cent. per annum; the loan to be redeemed within fifteen years; and the whole property of the company to be offered as security. The proposal was approved by the shareholders.

To commemorate the Japan-Russia war, the Naval authorities have fixed upon May 27th on which to celebrate the naval battles. The reason for preferring this day is of course that the battle of the Japan Sea began on May 27th.

A report from Kanazawa in the Asahi says that during the examination of the Japanese prisoners from Russia, it appeared that Assistant Paymaster M. Aoyama belonging to the Ninth Artillery Regiment, had deserted from the army and stolen money belonging to his regiment and that he surrendered to the Russians. Since then he had been detained by the enemy as a prisoner. He is to be tried by court martial.

A Government Bill regarding national loan bonds was submitted on March 20th to the House of Representatives. According to Article 1, the Minister for Finance will regulate matters with regard to the issuing of national loan bonds, the redemption of loans, payment of interest, and registration of the bonds. Article 3 provides that persons who receive bonds as security cannot be regarded as holders as against the Government or any other third party unless the documents are registered as for the purpose of being pledged. As to registration of the bonds, a special provision is made in article 4 that it will cease one month before the due date of payment of interest with the exception of cases of conveyance of rights by succession, gift or legal seizure. The extinction of prescription, according to article 9, is ten years for the principal and five years for the interest. The bill does not mention any date when the law will come into operation. A very brief explanation was attached to the bill to the effect that in consequence of the increase of national bonds and the development of financial affairs, necessity has arisen for regulating their management in case of loss of security or any other contingencies.

As already reported, the Russian revolutionaries at Nagasaki intend to publish a weekly paper under the appellation of Liberty. They are said to be in co-operation with colleagues at Vladivostok, and recently drafted a statement to be presented to the national assembly to be held on April 5th. In this were included two petitions, one asking for the pardon of the mutineers in the Black Sea affair, and the other for universal suffrage. They added the interesting requirements (1) that a prince of the blood should be sent to Japan in order to make draw closer the friendly relations between the two countries; and to sell north Saghalien to America with the view of pacifying the Japanese and averting future trouble between Russia and Japan.

Some eighty leading bankers of Tokyo, dined together on the evening of March 20th, at the Bankers' Club in honour of Mr. K. Takahashi, Vice-Governor of the Bank of Japan, and President of the Yokohama Specie Bank, and Mr. Soyeda, President of the Nippon Industrial Bank. Baron Shibusawa in a speech eulogized the success of Mr. Takahashi in raising several loans in London and other foreign cities and also the achievement of Mr. Soyeda in lending a large amount of money to the Korean Finance Department during his recent visit to Seoul. Mr. Takahashi duly replied and spoke on the conditions of the money market in London. Mr. Soyeda also delivered a speech on financial and social affairs in Korea.

The prospects of the tea crop seem to be promising. The weather so far has been favourable, and the yield is expected to be better than in average years should there be no serious climatic change—such as frost—in the future. The Nichi Nichi says that the failure of the tea industry last year was attributed to two causes, namely, the untoward weather experienced and the overhasty picking of young leaf in the attempt to get the new crop on the market. This year it has been agreed by growers not to gather the young leaf, which will reduce the yield.

M. Bakhmeteff, Russian Minister to Tokyo, will leave San Francisco to-day, March 22nd, by the steamer Korea. He is expected to arrive at Yokohama on April 9th.

The Toyo Kisen Kaisha held a meeting of shareholders on March 20th at the Nihonbashi Club, Tokyo. Mr. S. Asano presided and submitted the accounts for the last half year. The net income was yen 167,724.83 to which the balance yen 24,587.51, brought over from the previous account, and twenty thousand yen from the reserve for equalization of dividends were added, making a total of yen 212,312.34. Of this ten thousand yen were set apart as legal reserve, yen 195,000 to be paid as dividend at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum; and the remainder carried forward to the next account.

The Nippon Red Cross Society has decided to hold a general meeting on April 10th at Ueno and Her Majesty the Empress with grace the occasion with her presence. On the following day, there will be a funeral service in honour of the officers and men who died during the war.

The Yokohama Chamber of Commerce on March 20th presented addresses to the Premier, and the Ministers of Finance and Agriculture and Commerce, pointing out the necessity for dredging the harbour inside the breakwater.

The Kanagawa Kencho has issued regulations with regard to the construction or reconstruction of warehouses. According to Articles 2 and 3, when it is proposed to build a godown, the site, the plan of construction, etc., and the kind of goods to be stored in it must be reported to the police office concerned; and the owners of already existing warehouses are required to report to the same office, within sixty days after the coming into force of the regulations, the same conditions. Art. 3 provides the materials to be employed in construction: (1) the basement floor to be of stone, brick, asphalt (not less than 1 sun in thickness), concrete (not less than 3 sun in thickness) and the joints of bricks are to be filled with cement or mortar; if planking is to be used in the floor it must be laid so as to be taken up easily. (2) metal plates to be attached as lining to the inside of the walls and the inside of the roof of plaster or wooden godowns. (3) the doors and windows to be sheathed with metal plates. (4) all openings or crevices to be covered with metal plates. (5) If a godown is situated by the side of the sea, special attention must be given in construction to prevent invasion by rats. (6) Drains must be built of stone, brick, concrete or earthenware. It is provided by Art. 5 that if an existing warehouse does not comply with the requirements of Art. 3, it must be re-constructed within a year from April 1st. Infringement of the regulations involves punishment of detention for not over ten days or of a fine of not over ten yen. The regulations will come into operation on April 1st in the present year.

Pleasant news to the many friends of Mr. and Mrs. James Walter will be the information just received in Yokohama of the conferring upon their son, Maurice W. Walter, what we cannot but think is a very rare honour in connection with International football. Mr. Walter, who is now at Merchiston, the famous Scottish school, has taken a keen interest in the sport, and it seems that his form in some recent games attracted the notice of both the English and Scottish Rugby Unions. At any rate a letter was written to him by the former offering him a place as one of the three-quarters in the English International team but as his address was not known it was sent to a friend of his with the London Scottish. Meantime the offer had been made public and young Walter was deluged with letters and telegrams of congratulation, and also enquiries as to why he should desert Scotland where he had learned his "footer." Matters reached their climax when the London Scottish friend appeared on the scene and produced from one pocket the English letter and from another an offer from the Scottish Union of a Scottish "cap." There can not be much doubt as the recipient's decision, but that a lad of 18 should be offered places in two international teams in one and the same game, must be unique. Congratulations are in order.

The Jiji Shimpō in Sunday's issue writes that a visit of Admiral Togo and Field Marshal Oyama to Europe and America at the present time would tend to deepen the impression made on Western countries by Japan's great feats of arms. There is no doubt that they would be welcomed and honoured everywhere and exceptional opportunities would be given to them to inspect the armies and navies of other nations. Certain changes and improvements are in contemplation here in both the Army and the Navy, says the Jiji. Before these are finally decided on a thorough investigation of the methods and weapons relied on by the most forward Western countries could not but prove of great service to our military and naval experts. The cost of the proposed trip the Jiji puts at 100,000 yen. So great is the enthusiasm of the nation over recent victories that it would willingly provide the money were it appealed to in an earnest way by the two Houses of the Diet. The Jiji suggests that Marquis Oyama should be accompanied by Generals Nogi and Kuroki and that Admiral Togo should take a small fleet with him. As the session of the Diet is now nearly at an end the Jiji urges the members to take this proposal into immediate consideration.

At 9.50 a.m. on March 17th, a train on the Tokaido Railway was derailed at a point near Fujieda causing damage to the permanent way. In about an hour, however, traffic was resumed.

At Gifu station, two freight trains collided about 6.30 a.m. on March 19th. The locomotives of both were greatly damaged and with some cars were derailed. The line was also injured. Repairs were completed in about three hours.

The Pioneer prints with justifiable pride the following special India Army Order which has been issued by Lord Kitchener the Commander-in-chief in India:—

His Excellency the Commander-in-chief has much gratification in conveying to the troops the following gracious communication which he has received from His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales:

"My Dear Lord Kitchener,—After having spent three days in the camp of manoeuvres of a large portion of the Army of India, and witnessed the parade and march past of this morning, I am anxious to express my appreciation of the physical fitness and high standard of training evinced by the troops in the field, and of their smart and soldier-like bearing on parade. I much regret that time would not permit of my staying longer with them, but I have seen enough to enable me to form a high estimate of the efficiency of the Army, and of its readiness to take the field whenever called upon to do so. While congratulating you on your splendid command, I beg that you will convey to all ranks the assurance of my great pleasure in having been thus personally associated for the first time with the King-Emperor's Army in India under these practical conditions. I shall take the earliest opportunity of communicating to His Majesty these very favourable impressions which I have been able to form. Believe me, yours very sincerely, George P."

According to a Bill which has already passed the House of Peers, entitled "A Bill Revising Certain Conscription Regulations," Japanese residing in China for business purposes, as teachers or as students, are not to be exempted from military service in this country. The To-a Dobunkai (Eastern Asia One-Script Society) have taken the matter up very earnestly. They point out that there is in China a very large number of Japanese who are employed by the Chinese Central Government or by provincial or municipal authorities. There are also many Japanese students in China who have gone over to study the language, and a good number of respectable business men are settled here and there on the great continent. Among them not a few, under the new regulations, will be liable to be recalled for military service. The Japanese students under training in the Shanghai School known as the To-a Dobun Shoin, when they have finished their course there are despatched to Chinese provincial schools as teachers where they do excellent work, infusing new ideas into the Chinese mind. But these new regulations if carried out will put a stop to the labours of the Dobunkai on behalf of Chinese enlightenment. The Bill seems not to have received the consideration it deserves in the Upper House, say the To-a Dobunkai.

In the fifteen years between January 1st, 1891, and February 1st, 1906, the holdings of gold bullion by six of the largest banks of Europe have more than doubled, showing an increase of 125.4 per cent. The gold holdings of the Bank of France increased £68,890,824, or 152.95 per cent.; this was the largest total increase in quantity of gold, but not in percentage. The greatest increase in the latter was made by the Bank of Austria-Hungary, being 740.09 per cent.; the quantity of its holdings increased £40,054,000. These two banks showed a far greater advance in holdings than any of the other banks. The Bank of England's increase was 39.61 per cent., while the Bank of Germany's was 37.36 per cent.; but the increase in quantity of the latter bank was somewhat greater than the former's. At the beginning of 1891 the amount of gold bullion held by the first three banks was somewhat below the average, hence the very large increase shown. The following table shows the holdings of gold of the enumerated banks upon January 1, 1891, and February 1, 1906:—

Bank of	Jan. 1, 1891.	Feb. 1, 1906.

On February 9th, the Royal Astronomical Society of Great Britain conferred its Gold Medal upon Professor W. W. Campbell, of the famous Lick Observatory. This is an international award, the highest the Society is able to bestow, and it is significant in the elucidation of celestial problems that in three successive years the honour has gone to American astronomers, Professors Hale and Boss having been the recipients in the past two years. Professor Campbell has initiated invaluable work with his big telescope at Mount Hamilton, California, and is, perhaps, most widely known for his discoveries concerning the Pole star, the most familiar point in all the heavens. Since the dawn of history it has been believed to be a single star. Professor Campbell took many photographs of Polaris—or, rather, of its spectrum—with the interesting result that the star was found to be approaching the earth with a velocity of about five miles a second. But after intervals of two days the speed of the star had increased to more than eight miles a second, and the cycle of change was reported every four days. This indicated that the bright star was accompanied by a dark, unseen star, in an orbit comparable in size to that of the moon round the earth. Four years earlier the observations had shown a speed of approach of twelve miles a second. The greater part of this discrepancy Professor Campbell attributes to the attraction of a dark third star on the double system, lying at a greater distance apart, and revolving with the other around a common centre, probably in a period extending over several years. The Pole Star is thus a triple system.

A sum of £870,996 has been left by Mr. John Feeney, the proprietor of the Birmingham Daily Post and the Birmingham Daily Mail. The fact awakens interest as to the fortunes which English newspaper proprietors have built up during the past fifty years, and the following list of recent wills illustrates this:

Sir J. Jaffray, Birmingham Daily Post .....	£ 627,990
John Edward Taylor, Manchester Guardian .....	367,484

The estate of Mr. John Walter of The Times was valued at £277,575; that of Mr. Joseph Moses Levy of the Daily Telegraph at £475,000, and that of Edward Lloyd of the Daily Chronicle £563,743. But the wills of the three last named were proved before it was the practice in the Probate Registry to enter the value of real estate in the calendars, and it is probable, therefore, that the value of the estates was in each case more than stated. The estate of W. H. Smith & Son, news agents, was valued for probate at £1,764,460.

Summarizing the new information brought to light by the last expedition sent out to explore the peninsula of Sinai, under the leadership of Professor Fiinders Petrie, Mr. W. St. Chad Boscawen says, in the course of a very interesting article contributed to the Globe:—

In the oldest Semitic temple arrangements and ceremonial which we find in Babylonia we see an exactly similar arrangement to that of the temple on the Sinai peninsula explored by Professor Petrie. In the lowest strata of the mound at Nippur—below the pavements of the temple of Sargon and Naram Sin, B.C. 3700—within a low brick wall forming the enclosure of the temenos, was a massive altar of brickwork, the upper portion of which was still covered with the ashes of animal remains burned for sacrifice. In front of the altar and near to the entrance to the sacred enclosure stood two large terra cotta vases, evidently intended for ceremonial purification. The arrangement of the Sinaitic temple and that of Nippur are exactly the same, the latter being perhaps more primitive. Here, then, we have proof of the presence in the Sinaitic peninsula, at about thirty-eight centuries before our era, of a people whose religious ceremonial presented an almost complete agreement with that of the Semites of the Tigro-Euphrates valley. These discoveries, taken in conjunction with the numerous other traces of Semitic life in the wilds of Sinai—the holy wells, the sacred heaps of stones, and the Bethels which abound in the region—throw a new light upon the question of the Hebrew sojourn in this region. The arrangements of the Tabernacle—if stripped of the many fantastic additions of a later time—are exactly the same as those described above. The brazen sea, the laver, the huge altar of burnt-offering; are but a Hebrew form of the old Babylonian ceremonial. The Sinaitic peninsula maintained its Semitic character until long after the Christian era, and many of the ancient spots retained their sanctity, as proved by the Sinaitic inscriptions on the rocks, mostly the graffiti of Nabathean, Aramean, Jewish, and later Christian pilgrims. One other result of this expedition needs to be mentioned. The remains of Egyptian offerings, vases of glazed ware, figures, &c., found, show that the Egyptians were in full possession of the mines until very late, and especially during the reign of Rameses II. and his son, the Pharaohs of the Oppression and Exodus, which renders it very doubtful if the Israelites passed through this region. Notwithstanding the labours of many explorers and archaeologists, Sir Charles Warren, Professors Palmer, Hull, Dawson, and others, and the recent expedition, the settlement of the true site of Sinai is as far off as ever. This failure of the discovery of really historical evidence of Babylonian occupation may, we hope, lead to further explorations on the east side of Sinai, and especially in the old Midianite kingdom, bordering on the Gulf of Akabad. This practically unexplored region should yield material to solve several problems still before the archaeologist regarding the early Semites, and the extent of Babylonian influence in Arabia and adjacent lands.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

Only a small attendance of members of the Yokohama Literary Society listened on Friday evening to a very entertaining lecture by the Rev. Geo. Wallace, of Tokyo, who had for subject "An Open Question."

Mr. Wallace explained that the "Open Question" was, "Do the people of the United States or the people of England—the better speak their common language?" He himself was born an Englishman, but early in life was translated to American soil. His father was a Scotsman, although he happened to be born in England, and his mother was an English woman. The theme he had chosen therefore was one he could treat with malice towards none and charity towards all. Mr. Wallace gave a most interesting and entertaining lecture and in closing expressed the opinion that the American influence on the English language had been good. The increased means of travel, and the bringing of many people together, the multiplication of public libraries and the extended use of reading had the result that there was more uniformity in speaking the tongue of William Shakespeare in the United States of North America than elsewhere in the world, and every American could be easily understood when he spoke the English language by the people in any village in the country districts from Maine to California or from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. Taking the American people as a whole they spoke the English language better than the inhabitants of Great Britain. If those present did not all agree with him they need not argue the matter: it was "an open question."

At the conclusion the president, Mr. A. Bellamy Brown, expressed the thanks of the members to Mr. Wallace.

The musical programme included selections from "The Geisha" in which "Jack's the Boy," by Mr. S. H. Somerton, and "Chin Chin Chinaman," by Mr. A. H. Windett, were, perhaps, the favourites. Mr. Somerton in response to an encore resang the last verse of his song, while Mr. Windett's encore song was "The Inquisitive Kiddy." The other vocalists were Miss Lloyd Thomas, who sang "The Amorous Goldfish," Mr. A. E. Cooper, "Star of My Soul," and Mr. B. C. Foster, "Chivalry."

The military authorities will have finished compiling the accounts of expenses incurred by the Russian prisoners in Japan before the end of March. The statement will be forwarded to Mr. I. Motono, Japanese Minister in St. Petersburg, who will pass it on to the Russian Government.

PRINCE ARTHUR DEPARIS.

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT

left Japan on March 16th by the Royal Mail steamship Empress of Japan, of the Canadian Pacific Railway trans-Pacific line, amid a chorus of hearty good-wishes. His Royal Highness has left behind him the impression of a most engaging personality. Several old residents who met the DUKE of CONNAUGHT during his trip to Japan some sixteen years ago saw many of his pleasant qualities of heart and mind reproduced in his son. The same engaging frankness, the same readiness to discharge to the full all the onerous obligations which devolve upon a Prince of the Blood Royal by virtue of exalted rank, were seen to be predominant traits. Throughout his life these have been the distinguishing virtues of the DUKE OF CONNAUGHT. Of him it can be truly said that he has borne unsullied the white flower of a blameless life, and now as Grandmaster of English Freemasons and the Inspector-General of the British Army King EDWARD's only surviving brother occupies a unique position in the affections of all the subjects of the British Crown as a clear-thinking, clean-living gentleman of whom the whole nation may be justly proud. Such is the reputation of the father and his son, who said farewell to these shores last week, gives high promise of following in his footsteps. Though young in years, Prince ARTHUR has done service for his country both in the camp and in the court, and he has demonstrated to the full that the high trust confided in him has not been misplaced. His Mission to Japan has been crowned with success. On every hand he has won encomiums from a nation which must take rank as the most chivalrous, observant, and uniquely courteous of any on the face of the earth. He came to a Court which represents traditions running back to a time before history came to be written and as a representative of the Royal House of CERDIC—the oldest reigning family in Christendom—he has not been found wanting in all those qualities which we attribute to one of such high birth. As the London Times remarked recently, the Garter Mission was an act of high national policy and came opportunely to remind the English and Japanese people of the enduring forces which mould the destinies of the world irrespective of the fluctuations of domestic politics. Such is the light in which it is also viewed in Japan, and the best of good-wishes now accompany the Bearer of the Garter on his voyage to the home land. He arrived in bright sunshine, typical of his sunny presence, and he departed in the full glory of a mid-March sun. During his stay he experienced many varieties of weather, snow, sleet, frost, rain, and bluster winds, not to mention two of the most alarming earthquakes which Japan has felt for a long time, but if Dame Nature was wry-faced the Japanese nation received him with open arms. Hospitalities have been showered upon him, and on every hand the people delighted to show him honour. He must have garnered a rare store of happy reminiscences and we can assure him that every one with whom he came in contact in Japan will watch his future career with absorbing interest.

A BRILLIANT MAN OF LETTERS.

JOWETT, the immortal Master of Balliol, once declared: "FROUDE is a man of genius and has been abominably treated." Such is also the impression conveyed to the reader after a perusal of Mr. HERBERT PAUL's biography of the brilliant essayist and historian. Few men have had more abuse heaped upon them than FROUDE, few have had finer opportunities than his long life allowed of so completely turning the tables upon his critics. The son of a dignitary of the Church of England, JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE's precocious childhood was spent at Dartington, one of the most beautiful spots in England, and beside one of the loveliest of English rivers. But that childhood must have been one of the saddest on record. Losing his mother when only a tiny child, FROUDE's life was not again influenced by women till he entered the University. His father the Archdeacon was a man of the high-and-dry type of clergyman, with a few of the Stoic virtues and all of their rigidity; a very hard man, indeed, for a child. His elder brother, HURRELL FROUDE, was an ascetic Newmanite, who considered a younger brother a proper subject for religious discipline. HURRELL had other qualities, but as an elder brother he was a dour man. The whole family meanwhile was devastated with consumption, and young ANTHONY grew up as one appointed to death. His home life was a martyrdom, his school life at Westminster a torture. And though his gifts could not be gainsaid, he appeared to have earned the disapproval of all his relations and preceptors. In these years, says Mr. PAUL, he learned that contempt for self-indulgence and indifference to pain which led him in after years to his rather ruthless application of the strong-man and physical-force theory of life and history. School days done he went to Oriel College, Oxford. There he enjoyed himself, fell in love, first with HOMER and PINDAR's odes, and then with a young lady, whom, however, he was not allowed to marry. Then he came deeply under the influence, already potent, of NEWMAN. A tutorship next took him into the family of a devout Irish Evangelical, a Mr. CLEAVER. The Evangelical character impressed him very favourably, but he could not subscribe to their tenets. Returning to Oxford FROUDE was elected a Fellow of Exeter College, and as a condition of the Fellowship took Holy Orders. It was at this time that NEWMAN induced him to assist in the writing of the "Lives of the Saints." Mr. PAUL tells the story in his second chapter:—

Newman had a definite polemical purpose. Just as he felt the force of Hume's argument against the probability of miracles, so he realised the difficulty of answering Gibbon's inquiry when miracles ceased. Had they ever ceased at all? Many Roman Catholics, if not the most enlightened and instructed, thought not. Newman conceived that the lives of English and Irish saints held much matter for edification, including marvels and portents of various kinds. He desired that these things should be believed, as he doubtless believed them. They proved, he thought, if they could be proved themselves, that supernatural power resided in the Church, and when the Church was concerned he laid his reason aside. He was extraordinarily sanguine. "Rationalise," he said to Froude, "when the evidence is weak, and this will give credibility for others when you can show the evidence is strong." Froude chose St. Neot, a contemporary of Alfred, in whose life the supernatural played a comparatively small part. He told his story as legend, not quite as Newman wanted it. "This is all," he said at the end, "and perhaps rather more than all, that is known of the life of Blessed St. Neot."

Mr. PAUL drily records that "FROUDE's connexion with the series ceased." FROUDE at the same time discovered that he had made a mistake in his vocation; that he was suited neither for a Romanist snor for an Anglican priest. While in this frame of mind he wrote "The Nemesis of Faith" and at once had an angry pack snarling at his heels. WILLIAM SEWELL, founder of Radley, as senior tutor, publicly burnt the offending treatise on the hearthstone of Exeter College. It was a theatrical display of puerile vindictiveness which fifty years later the University was publicly ashamed of. FROUDE was called on to resign his fellowship: his father withdrew his allowance, but CHARLES KINGSLEY, most generous of men, took him in when his family and other friends forsook him. He fell in love with Mrs. KINGSLEY's sister, Miss CHARLOTTE GRENFELL, married, and gave himself to literature. But despite all this FROUDE remained to the end of his days a religious man in the deepest sense of the word, and there is nothing more interesting than the account of his religious position which he wrote to a member of his family from South Africa at "the age of seventy-four."

"It is to me certain," he writes, "that the world and we who live in it, with all these mysterious conditions of our being, are no creation of accident or blind force. We were created for purposes unknown to us by Almighty God, who is using us and training us for His own objects—objects wholly unconceivable by us, but nevertheless which we know to exist, for Intelligence never works but for an end."

At times he was subject to eclipses of faith and Sir GEORGE COLLEY, who travelled back with him from South Africa, paints a sombre picture of the man in one of these despairing moods:—

"He seemed to have gone through every phase of thought, and come to the end 'All is Vanity.' He himself used to say the interest of life to a thinking man was exhausted at thirty-five. After that there remained but disappointment of earlier visions and hopes. Sometimes there was something almost fearful in the gloom and utter disbelief and defiance of his mind."

Fortunately these moods were transient. FROUDE's historical work began in the Westminster Review with an essay on "England's Forgotten Worthies," which had undoubtedly been suggested to him by a perusal of HAKLUYT's fascinating Voyages. Then he plunged into other historical fields and the lists were soon drawn up in battle array. By a strange coincidence FROUDE unluckily managed to concentrate upon himself the hatred of two very opposite sets of people; the High Anglicans, of whose bugbear HENRY VIII. he had dared to make a hero, and the Radicals, whose creed he had set himself to expose and whose prophets he invariably derided. And the still stranger thing was that these very dissimilar factions were able to unite in employing the same man as the executioner of their vengeance. For the purpose of crushing FROUDE, FREEMAN could pass very well as a Defender of the Faith; for the same laudable object he could be accepted as an apostle of liberalism. Hence arose the long series of attacks launched against FROUDE by FREEMAN in the Saturday Review and elsewhere, till, at last, as Mr. PAUL tells us, FROUDE turned to bay, delivered one blow, and never had to touch his enemy again, till he made a generous reference to him on succeeding him—strange irony of fate—in the Chair of History at Oxford. As a reviewer in The Times points out, the really interesting question is not that of FROUDE's honesty, or even of the general truthfulness of his picture, which, except as regards HENRY VIII., is not now seriously disputed, though Major HUME's recent book gives a somewhat different aspect to the story of the KING; it is that of his conception of the historian's task. "History is a science, no less and no more," said the Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge two years ago, on which Mr. PAUL very justly comments:

"If this view is correct and exhaustive, Froude was no historian. He must remain outside the pale in the company of Thucydides, Tacitus, Gibbon, Macaulay, and Mommsen."

There is the issue. Is history a science or an art? It is the business of science to know the facts and let them alone, as untouched as may be by humanity or personality. It is equally the business of art to know the facts, but by no means to let them alone. Art is nature seen through humanity, history is the story of life seen through personality, and everywhere the facts of life are seen through a temperament, the temperament of RAPHAEL or RUBENS or TURNER, of TACITUS, of SAINT SIMON, of MACAULAY. It is obvious to which school FROUDE belonged. Could a great historian possibly belong to any other? If a really scientific historian arose, one who had no creed or temperament, or at least never let us discover it, would anybody read him? Very likely PYM and CROMWELL would not have thought CLARENDON an impartial historian; very likely TIBERIUS would not have liked reading the "Annals" of TACITUS, or the DUC DE MAINE admire the "Memoirs" of SAINT SIMON. But the pages of CLARENDON and TACITUS and SAINT SIMON are eternally alive, and they owe their life to the fact that their writers cared intensely, eagerly, even bitterly, about the things they were describing. There was alloy, no doubt, in FROUDE's gold; but in spite of it, or because of it, his work is imperishable. No one will ever again tell the tale of the breaking of the bonds of Rome as he told it; no one will ever dream of rivalling his story of the momentous struggle that left England the free and Protestant nation, with eyes always looking across the seas, that she has been ever since. And those immortal pages could not have been written if FROUDE had not been, carelessly, openly, and exultantly, what Mr. PAUL calls him, a "Protestant, Puritan, <sup>sea</sup> loving, priest-hating Englishman." Mr. ANDREW LANG, a critic as just as he is graceful in expression, sums up the matter in some admirable sentences which Mr. PAUL quotes, ending thus:—"No historian was more honest than Mr. FROUDE, though few or none of his merit have been so fallible." That he was a real student, and made genuine original research of a kind that FREEMAN, who depended entirely on printed texts, never attempted, his labours in the archives of Simancas were sufficient to prove. Of his style all the educated world could judge and has judged. In the short time left him in the evening of his life, he made a real mark on the intellectual temper of the Oxford under-graduates and set up a standard of style in lecturing and writing of which the University is still proud. As the Spectator says, in closing its review of his biography:—

Froude was, in truth, a fine specimen of that English race which he has in many a shining page depicted so finely,—a scholar, a student, yet no recluse, but with a keen eye and a warm heart for all the varied drama of life as well as for the beauty of that element which suited so well his fearless and frank disposition, the English element,—the sea.

FOR THE SAKE OF POSTERITY.

PUBLIC opinion has changed very radically in England since the days when a member of Parliament, speaking from his seat in the House of Commons, declined to vote for a certain bill because it would benefit posterity. As he triumphantly pointed out, "What had posterity done for him?" Nowadays men of science are doing their best to impress upon the nations of the earth the deep obligations they are under to pass on to posterity a better and a happier world than that into which they were born. Others again, taking up a different phase of the question, point out with grim-faced pessimism that it is time we all learnt to be a little more economical in our uses of the gifts which Dame Nature provides. Sir WILLIAM CROOKES remarked a few years ago that with the population of the world increasing at its present ratio and the corn-producing area remaining stationary we were in measureable reach of starving to death owing to an inevitable falling-off in food supplies. Other men of science have warned us that over large areas of the earth's surface there has been within the past fifty years an appreciable shrinkage in the water-supply. So we are, it would seem, if we escape starvation, in danger of dying by thirst. Altogether a gloomy prospect for poor posterity. Meanwhile practical men are taking steps to circumvent the future by helping Nature to increase her gifts to mankind. Professor SILVANUS THOMPSON is one of these. Speaking before the Royal Institution in London recently, he described how it is now possible to produce nitrates from the atmosphere by the aid of electrical processes. He began his address by emphasizing the enormous practical importance of the question in connexion with the wheat supply of the world. The demand for wheat by the white races, he pointed out, increased every year with the increase of population. But the acreage of land devoted to wheat growing did not increase at an equal rate, and in any case, being limited by climatic conditions, would all be taken up in a comparatively small number of years, perhaps less than 30. When that condition of affairs was reached there must be a wheat famine, unless, as Sir WILLIAM CROOKES informed the British Association in 1898, the world's yield per acre (at present about 1.27 bushels) could be increased by the use of fertilizers. Wheat required some fertilizer containing fixed nitrogen, and the chief substance of the kind now available was nitrate of soda, obtained from the nitre beds of Chile. The demand for this had practically doubled since 1890, and in 1905 was over a million and a half tons; at the present rate of consumption the supply would be exhausted in less than 30 years. Then the only chance of averting starvation from the races for which wheat was the staple food would be, as CROOKES pointed out, through the laboratory, through chemists discovering some method by which at a sufficiently cheap rate the free nitrogen of the atmosphere could be fixed in a form that could be utilized by the wheat plant. CAVENDISH, 120 years ago, had shown that the nitrogen and oxygen of the air could be made to enter into combination with each other by the action of the electric spark; but, although this early laboratory experiment undoubtedly indicated a way which might lead to a method of securing an artificial supply of fixed nitrogen, many investigators had attempted the practical solution of the problem in vain. One difficulty was that the yield of oxidized nitrogen obtained from air by the electric discharge was very small; the reaction was reversible and the nitrogen oxides formed were in turn split up by the spark into free oxygen and nitrogen as soon as they were present in any quantity. But if the operation were conducted at a high temperature a considerably larger percentage of oxides had to be present before this reversed action took place, and, further, the formation of those oxides was rendered more rapid. These facts were utilized in the process of BIRKELAND and EYDE, of Christiania, who made use of a special electric furnace. In this an alternating electric arc was produced at between 3,000 and 4,000 volts, and was formed between the poles of an electromagnet which forced it to take the shape of a disc of roaring flame, four or five feet in diameter. Ordinary air was blown through the furnace, and emerged charged with nitrous fumes, the rapidity with which the product was removed from the sphere of operations being an important element. The nitrous fumes were collected, allowed time to oxidize still further, and then absorbed in water-towers or in quicklime. Experiment showed that the nitrate of lime produced was as good a fertilizer as Chile saltpetre. The conditions in Norway were exceptionally good for furnishing cheap electric power, the cost at the factory now in operation at Notodden was less than one-tenth of a penny per unit, and when further extensions had been carried out it was expected it would be reduced to about one-fortieth of a penny. Hence the new "Norwegian saltpetre" could compete with the saltpetre from Chile, and would every year become more valuable as the demand for nitrates increased and the natural supplies become exhausted.

Posterity being thus provided for satisfactorily in regard to its future wheat supplies, the next question to be attacked must be the conservation of water. This will perhaps be achieved by the aid of reforestation of vast areas now entirely denuded of trees; by the bringing to the surface through artesian borings of the large subterranean accumulations of water known to lie under certain of the stratified rocks, while many a dashing, careless torrent and eke a noble stream which now flow heedlessly to the sea will be so harnessed that every drop of water passing along their channels will have to do some harder work in the service of humanity than merely sparkling in the sunshine or shimmering in the moonlight. Pessimists notwithstanding, the welfare of posterity seems at present in remarkably good guardianship.

"TIS DOGGED AS DOES IT."

THE death of Lord MASHAM in his 92nd year has drawn forth some interesting biographical notices in the English papers. Born near Bradford in 1815, the son of a manufacturer and gentleman of means, SAMUEL CUNLIFFE LISTER gave no indication in his youth of what his after life was to be. He began his working career by entering a mercantile house in Liverpool and it was not till he was 23, when he had visited America once or twice, that he came in contact with work or machinery of any kind. In 1838 he became a partner with his elder brother JOHN in a worsted spinning factory, beginning work in a mill which their father had built on an ancestral property at Manningham. This mill was burnt down in 1871 and has been replaced by the largest and handsomest textile mill in the world covering 28 acres of ground and costing a million sterling. It was the invention of the wool-combing machine which first brought name and fame to young LISTER. The problem had long occupied many minds. The process of combing wool almost explains itself; it is literally combing out the fibres as hair is combed. Its object is to straighten them out and separate the shorter from the longer ones. The object of separation is to utilize them for different purposes. The longer hairs can be spun into a better yarn than the shorter ones and will make better cloth. Such yarn is called worsted and is used for all kinds of superior dress materials. The short hairs make woollen yarn, which is used for blankets and other rough and cheap materials. Down to about 60 years ago wool was still combed by hand, a slow process which strictly limited the supply of worsted yarn and consequently of cloth. CARTWRIGHT, the inventor of the power loom, had invented a combing machine toward the end of the eighteenth century; and attempts had been made to bring it into use, but without any permanent success. A Frenchman named JOSUE HEILMANN is said to have anticipated LISTER's great invention, and in 1863 there was exhibited in the Royal Academy in London a picture having for subject the genesis of the French wool-combing invention. Sitting by his hearth one night, meditating on the hard fate of inventors, HEILMANN unconsciously watched his daughters combing their long hair and drawing it out at full length between their fingers. The thought suddenly struck him that, if he could successfully imitate in a machine the process of combing out the longest hair and forcing back the short, by reversing the action of the comb, it might extricate him from his difficulty. Upon this idea he proceeded, and produced his combing machine. But it was left to LISTER, in conjunction with a Mr. DONISTHORPE, to make the Nip machine a practical success. Other inventions quickly followed, and in 1853 LISTER took out nine patents, among them one for treating soap-suds, which proved very profitable. The future Lord MASHAM was now, though unconsciously, approaching the crisis of his life. As The Times tells us, he was trying experiments on various fibres, and in 1855 he took out 12 patents for different textile processes. Among them were the earliest attempts at treating silk waste, which were to lead to so much tribulation and such triumphant success. The story, though old, is well worth retelling:—

In 1855 a dealer in London sent him a small quantity of silk waste. This stuff is produced in reeling the silk fibre from the cocoons. It consists of a tangled mass of silk threads mixed with twigs, bits of earth, fragments of dead chrysalis and other foreign bodies, and is just a nasty, dirty, sticky, unsavoury bundle of rubbish. There were hundreds of bales of it lying in the London Docks, but no one would buy it; and they could not even use it for manure, as it would not rot. The problem of mastering this stuff and turning it to account fascinated the inventor, and he was lost, or very nearly lost. He gave himself up to it, spent his fortune on it, his time, his brains, and his energy. He knew nothing about the manufacture of silk, or he would never have attempted the task, just as Cartwright knew nothing about weaving when he conceived the idea of inventing the power loom. Ignorance led him into it, and dogged tenacity kept him at it. He had given up the combing business, and in 1857 he had lost £150,000 and was in difficulties. But he would not give in, and when the directors of the Bank of England, very considerably sent for him and asked if he thought he could pay his way his Yorkshire pride and independence made him answer that he thought he could. And he did. It is a long story, and years passed before he succeeded in combing silk. In 1865 he had lost £250,000, and his partner left him, thinking he would become bankrupt. "I was then," he says, "at the mature age of 50, and had to begin the battle of life again under depressing and trying circumstances." But he faced it like a man, and lo! the tide turned. The silk comb began to pay, and when it paid there was no mistake about it. One year he had orders for all the yarn he could make at 23s. a lb., and the material cost him from 6d. to 1s. a lb. In nine years the silk comb made enough money to build and equip two new mills, and in addition paid £20,000 towards the cost of the velvet loom. This was the second of Lord Masham's great silk inventions. The successful idea, after much failure and expense, came to him one day in a flash of inspiration as his eye fell upon a grinder in the road. Then he saw how to sharpen the knife that cut the pile in the machine. The velvet-loom paid as well as the silk-comb. For years they brought in £200,000 a year; and Lord Masham became a millionaire several times over.

Personally Lord MASHAM was a man of great vigour. Of short stature, he was very strongly built and exceedingly active. When long past 80 he could walk men 20 or 30 years his junior off their legs. He was a very early riser, never in bed after 5 or 6 for many years; and amusing stories are told of his habits. On one occasion a workman sent from the mills to do some work at his country house, knowing his habits, thought he would be up in good time in the morning so as to make a good impression. Instead of 6.30, the usual hour, he got up at 6 and went to the conservatory where he was to work. There he saw the gardener. "Oh," said the gardener, "here you are. Mr. LISTER was asking for you about an hour ago." He was a moderate drinker and a great smoker. He smoked incessantly even in the mill, though it was strictly forbidden. A man of such strong character is, of course, the subject of many anecdotes, revealing his remarkable tenacity of purpose, his straightforwardness, his humour, and his inexhaustible energy. With all his multitudinous interests and concerns he never employed a secretary; and even on his deathbed his mind was busy with his last invention, which is a machine for compressing wheat into blocks for storage as an insurance against famine in war time. Such was the man who was throughout his long drawn-out day one of the greatest captains of industry the world has ever seen; to such as him Great Britain owes her commercial supremacy. But what a startling contrast in the condition of the working classes of England the long life of LORD MASHAM discloses. As a young man he was an eyewitness of the terrible conditions which prevailed in the great manufacturing districts all through the "starving forties." His inventions revolutionized the Yorkshire spinning industry and at the close of his life he saw Yorkshire and Lancashire in a more flourishing condition than has ever been known before. May we not use as his requiem the closing words of that wonderful address of TIRESIAS to the heroic ODYSSEUS:—

But for yourself . . .
Shall death come very gently, and shall slay
In green old age outworn, and round your throne
A prosperous people.

THE CRY OF THE LITTLE CHILDREN.

THE cult of the child is a modern outgrowth upon the surface of the body politic. Time was, and not so very long ago, either, when a policy of stern repression concerning the denizens of the nursery and the school-room was the fetish of all middle-class homes in Great Britain and America. Among the aristocracy the children were banished from the parents' ken entirely, handed over to the care of tutors and governesses till they reached what might be considered ages of discretion: while in the lower strata of humanity the children were entirely neglected by their progenitors. The depressing children's books which sprang up under the inspiring influence of "Sandford and Merton," to be continued by Mrs. BARBAULD and MARIA EDGEWORTH until long past mid-Victorian times, reflect fairly accurately the state of affairs then prevailing. But gradually the children of the upper and middle classes broke through the icy barriers of a worn-out tradition and came into the rightful kingdom of their own. The result has been a deepening of the affections as between parents and children, the strengthening of those bonds of feeling which bind family life together; a widening of the whole domestic horizon for every boy and girl. Fathers at the present day, indeed, make companions of their sons almost before they have left school in a manner undreamt of when EDWARD VII. was a young man: mothers are in closer and more harmonious accord with the bright young lives which gather around them in their daughters than they were even a generation ago. The change in the conditions of family life are wonderful to a middle-aged man harking back in memory to the days of his childhood. But while this happy condition of things prevails in one section of the social community, matters continue unchanged for the children of the very poor. The enormous industrial development of the last half century, which has led to the herding together of vast aggregations of humanity in all the cities of the world, has brought unutterable horrors in its train, but none are more terrible to behold than the enormous increase in the sorrowful burdens borne by the helpless offspring of the toiling millions. For them life is a grey, hard thing in very sooth. What can be more sad than the tales told in a recent issue of The Times concerning the play-hours of the London poor. "As a rule," writes the headmaster of a Somers-town school, "the children of this district are turned out after tea into the streets with the babies, and told not to come home till bed-time." They wander about, sometimes playing at games, like "father and mother," where a drunken father comes home and turns the mother and children into the streets; or "funerals"; or "cherry-ocks," where the stones of rotten cherries, wetted in the mouth, are thrown in clouds at the passers-by; or jumping aimlessly for an hour together "off the step" by way of physical exercise. The boys go about in groups or gangs, in preparation for those later gangs of idle youths which have added a new and melancholy word to current European speech. A Hoxton schoolmaster, writing to Mrs. HUMPHREY WARD, the well known novelist, says that for a large number of the children in his school the word "home" has absolutely no meaning. His letter proceeds:—

I will only write of that which I have seen and come in contact with during my 22 years as a teacher in Hoxton. Many of the families live in one room, and often during the whole of the evening the children are huddled together here, in this one ill-lit and badly ventilated room. Father very soon goes out, and probably mother; result—the children wait until they return before going to bed. A hard case is that where the mother goes to work and returns perhaps at 8 p.m. or later. Children cannot be trusted indoors, they therefore play in the streets. If they are allowed indoors they must not have a light—it would be dangerous and also expensive—they naturally therefore seek the streets, where they play or huddle together "until mother comes home." Many a plan is here laid for petty theft. The smaller ones are encouraged to beg from the shopkeepers and are often compelled by the older ones to steal from the shops whilst they, the older ones, wait round the corner. I have seen 20 children of all ages, playing outside a publichouse for hours, amid sights which render them callous. If it rains they seek a sheltered side street, and play there to the accompaniment of virulent abuse from the occupiers of the houses. My experience of London children is that they do not know how to play. It would be good work merely to teach them how to play. But, again speaking from 22 years' experience of boys in London, no game is enjoyed by them which does not give opportunity for gambling. They gamble with buttons, screws, cherry stones, and picture cards from packets of cigarettes. I have seen boys playing a real game of "Banker" with these picture cards, sitting silently for two hours at a stretch absorbed in the game.

The Warden of the Browning Settlement reports of Walworth:

In this crowded district, the only playgrounds for the children after dark are the streets; and the damp and cold stairs and corridors of the tenement blocks, where they sit and play on the hard stones. The homes are as a rule much too small and crowded to allow any room for child sports there. Not infrequently the one room is filled all night with washing, which must be punctually delivered next morning. Anything more dispiriting and heart-sickening than the Walworth streets on winter nights, in fog or drizzling rain with pavements and roads covered with fine adhesive and permeating mud, can scarcely be imagined; and the moral effect of what the child sees in the darkness need not be mentioned. And when it is remembered that most of the children are poorly shod, the dismal discomfort of what ought to be the brightest years in life is only too obvious. Not long ago I was following a poor little chap, his clothes seemingly a fortuitous combination of rags, flopping along in boots many sizes too large for him and with more holes than soles, along a muddy street on a rainy night; he seemed the very embodiment and type of the child misery of Walworth.

Mrs. HUMPHREY WARD is using her influence to provide a proper organization in London whereby the children of the working classes can obtain playgrounds where healthy amusements can be indulged in: where a little sunshine can be let into their dreary lives. London is not the only place, however, where child life is weighted down with a surplussage of misery. The cry of the little ones goes up unceasingly from every nation and even Japan, which has often been described as the Paradise of children, contributes no inconsiderable quota to the sad, heart-searching chorus of suffering childhood. It will be a happy day when this disgraceful stain upon modern civilization can be wiped away, when childhood becomes for its members in every rank of society a time of unclouded happiness and untrammelled joy, a thing to look back upon in after years as the veritable "golden age."

THE BOOKSHELF.

The scene of the story told by Lise Boehm in No. 10 of the "China Coast Tales" is laid in Formosa at a place called Kantow and the time is that of the French blockade in 1884-1885, the chief characters being the British Consul, the Commissioner of Customs and their respective wives. The Commissioner and the Consul's wife fall in love with each other and are killed together by a French shell. That shortly is the substance of the plot which is worked out with the success that usually attends this author's work. The book, which is published by Kelly and Walsh, Ltd., will be found very readable.

One of the best, because most useful, advertising publications that we have seen for a long time is the atlas issued by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha in conjunction with the passenger departments of the Burlington Route, the Great Northern Railway and the Northern Pacific Railway. It is at once an atlas, a huge directory of general information and a beautifully illustrated guide book. The Western, Northwestern and Middle Western states, the American island possessions, Japan, China, the United States and the World are all mapped.

This old established directory—now the only one in Yokohama and by far the best in Japan—comes out this year in a greatly improved form. Among the new features are revised maps of Yokohama and Kobe, the former being sectioned off in squares with reference letters and figures at top and in margin. Letters and figures also follow each name in the Alphabetical, Bluff and Ladies' Lists so that if one desires to know in what locality a person lives it is only necessary to note the letter and figure that follow the name in any of these lists and then, turning to the relative map, find him in the compass of a small square. For people not very well acquainted with the locality this is an excellent scheme—especially in view of the irregular way in which numbers are scattered all over the place. A quantity of matter has been expunged this year; the general information seems well up to date and the work will be found a valuable companion to all who usually have occasion to consult a book of this kind. The Japan Directory is issued from the office of the Japan Gazette Co.

S. ANDREW'S CHURCH, SHIBA TOKYO.

We reproduce the following report issued in connection with the accounts of S. Andrew's Church, Shiba, Tokyo, for the year 1905:—

A comparison with last year's statement of accounts shows an increase this year of Yen 192.71 in the amount offered through the collections in Church. Besides this a sum of Yen 366 was raised by special subscriptions towards defraying the expenses connected with the services and general upkeep of the building. These expenses show a tendency to increase, and in spite of a fairly strict economy came this year to Yen 534.54 as against Yen 481.65 last year; which means that out of the offerings made at the time of Divine Service we still had to spend Yen 168.64 on ordinary Church expenses. Our hope is that this year we shall meet the whole of those expenses by special subscriptions. It is a matter for thankfulness that largely owing to such special subscriptions we have been able during the past year to give away for various good objects Yen 1100 as compared with Yen 659 in the year preceding.

Those who wish to join in the effort to meet the whole of the Church expenses, and so to set free all the offerings made in Church for somewhat nobler uses, are asked to send their subscriptions to one of the members of our Church Committee—Lt.-Col. C. V. Hume, E. L. James, Esq. and F. P. Purvis, Esq.—or to the Rev. A. E. Webb (S. Andrew's House, Shiba) who acts as Honorary Treasurer.

IMPERIAL DIET.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m. on March 16th. The request for post-facto consent to payments from the Reserve during the war was handed to a special committee without discussion. The Government bills regarding the supplementary budget for 1906 and the payments in advance to the Railway Department in Formosa both of which were sent up from the House of Representatives, were unanimously passed. Two private bills regarding revision of the Silk-worm Disease Prevention Law and the Revision of the Law of Diet were submitted to Special Committees.

The House rose at 10.30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1 p.m., on March 16th. The Order of the Day was as follows:—

Government Bill regarding Nationalization of private railways; revision of City Organization; re-payment of taxes on alcohol used for industrial purposes and spirituous beverages; the Habutaye Bleaching Law; abolition of the Rural Division Organization; revision of the Press Regulations; Bills passed and sent down from the House of Peers.

Among various projects the Government bills regarding the law of Shrines, revision of the Coinage Law, and revision of the Conscription Law, were handed to special Committees after brief explanations by Government delegates. Thereupon the Railway Nationalization Bill was introduced. Previous to entering on the discussion, the following members signified their intention of taking part in the debate.

On the Railway Nationalization Bill the following obtained permission to speak before the House assembled:—

Mr. Haseba, Chairman of the committee, said that in the discussion of the committee, the bill was passed by 30 against 14 and that the committee decided to discuss the Bill regarding the purchase of the Seoul-Fusan Railway together with the Railway Nationalization Bill. Mr. Taketomi was the first to appear on the platform and in a very lengthy speech he urged the rejection of the bill. Mr. T. Sasa supported the bill after which Mr. Asano delivered a speech in opposition. The bill was eventually passed through all its readings by a very large majority.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

At 1.10 p.m. on March 17th, the House met. Mr. Y. Takekoshi, Chairman of the Petitions Committee, spoke on several petitions presented by traders of Yokohama and other cities asking for the rejection of the Government bill regarding the inspection of raw silk. He said that the petitions had been rejected by the committee on the ground that the nature of their request was not in accordance with the provisions of the law concerned. Mr. S. Fukui, one of the committee, opposed rejection and some debate followed. On the motion of Messrs H. Motoda and J. Haseba, the petitions were handed to a special committee consisting of twenty-seven members. The Government bill regarding the abolition of Gun-sei, or rural divisions, and five others were passed. Some private bills and petitions were rejected or passed, and others were submitted to special committees. At 3.45 p.m. the House rose.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10 a.m., on March 19th. The bill for the Nationalization of Railways was introduced by the Premier and after several questions had been asked and answered was handed to a special Committee of 27. The Savings Bank bill was passed, as was also the bill amending the Salt Monopoly law.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The principal business disposed of by the House on Monday was the passing of the proposal providing for rebates on alcohol and alcoholic liquors used for industrial purposes.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m. on March 22nd. Several Bills were referred to special committees; but the Bill regarding Savings Banks and the Bill to amend the Salt Monopoly Law were passed as modified by the Committees.

The House adopted 17 petitions, and rose at 11.45 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

There was such a meagre attendance of members of the Lower House on Thursday that the Order of the Day was not taken. Mr. Ema made a long speech upon a question regarding the arrest of persons suspected of sedition.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

All earnest students of the Japanese language must have often longed for the appearance of a Dr. Brewer in Japan. Who is there that is not familiar with Brewer's "Phrase and Fable" and his excellent "Reader's Handbook of Allusions, References, Plots and Stories." A work has just been published in Tokyo which in its humble way aims at doing for the Japanese language what the late venerable lexicographer did for English. One cannot take up a standard work in this country or even read a long well-written magazine article without coming across scores of classical allusions whose meaning it is unsafe to endeavour to guess. To consult a Japanese scholar in every case is for obvious reasons quite impossible. With a fairly good dictionary of phrases and allusions on the desk, one can get along alone and be increasing one's knowledge of the language every day. We are highly pleased with a work of this kind which lies before us. It is called Kokugo Kambun Tokushojiten (A Lexicon for Readers of Japanese and Chinese books). The compiler is Mr. Miyawaki Iku. Mr. Hatakeyama Ken, a very well-known scholar, has superintended the compilation. We have examined the work pretty closely and can confidently recommend it to students. It is published by the Sambunsha and Sekibunsha and sells at a very low price (1 yen 20 sen). It is 1,006 pages in length and, roughly speaking, we may say it contains at least 15,000 explanations of terms and allusions. There are two uses to which one wishes to put such a dictionary. (1) One often hears in conversation or at a public meeting expressions that one does not quite understand. If such a phrase be jotted down, it can be looked up in the Reader's Handbook at once. The phrases are all arranged after the a, i, u, e, o system, which is very convenient in a dictionary of the kind we are reviewing. Suppose one hears Ichinin-tosen one finds the expression written first in hiragana—all the headings are in hiragana. Then come the ideographs, 一人當千, and the following explanation; Ichinin no chikara sennin ni ataru to no i (意); ichinin nite sennin ni teki subeki wo iu. Ikki tosen (一騎當千). (2) But there is a quicker way of finding references and allusions in the Lexicon if one meets with them in reading. They can then be found instantly by a reference to the full index of subjects treated published at the beginning of the work. To take an instance, if one comes across 天上の五衰 Tenjo no gosui, the expression will be found in the index under the ideograph 天 and one is told to turn to p. 607, where a full account of the origin and the meaning of the allusion is given.* We are told that the expression refers to the death-throes of fairies—to the changes that precede the death of Heavenly beings (天人).

* It will be remembered by some readers that in a very beautiful part of the Hagoromo the words Tennin no gosui mo me no maye ni miyete asamashi ya occur—the fairy is overtaken by the 5 woes. (1) The pollution by dust of her heavenly raiment; (2) the withering of the crown of flowers; (3) a feeling of dizzy blindness; (4) a deadly sweat, (5) and the

The following information as to the scope of the book we cull from the compiler's introduction. The aim has been to explain every difficult phrase, term, idiom and allusion found in the school text-books now in use in Middle Schools. Ordinary expressions that almost every Japanese understands have been omitted. The classes of terms and phrases included are all little known archaisms, Japanese and Chinese, words referring to the Imperial House, to shrines and temples, to clothing, weapons, utensils, &c., names of places and men, Japanese and foreign, names of books, technical and scientific terms found in school-textbooks, Buddhist terms, proverbs, maxims, &c., terms referring to old Japanese customs or usages. The compiler tells us he has aimed at conciseness, clearness and relevance, and we think it may be said that he has succeeded in attaining these objects. The book will be found to contain a very rich collection of idioms, classical allusions of a high order, poetic symbols and figures of speech, such as, for instance, the beautiful fushimachi no tsuki, "the moon that waits in a reclining posture" (referring to its shape on the 19th day of the old lunar month) on p. 760. The difficulty of many of the expressions one casually comes across is felt by everybody. Who, unaided or untaught, could guess that Azuma no kame no kagami "the mirror of the Eastern tortoise" refers to the Kamakura Government? The expression takes its rise from a passage in the Isayoi Nikki (十六夜日記), as is pointed out on p. 18 of the Handbook. The names of all noted Japanese and Chinese as well as those of a great many Europeans and Americans have been included in the Dictionary. The type, though in the explanatory part small (No. 7), is clear. The book deserves a wide circulation and we hope that it will be followed by a still more exhaustive work printed in larger type. If any European or American is conceited enough to think he knows the Japanese language, we recommend him to spend an hour in examining this volume. With such a book before us the best of us can but feel that we have only been playing with pebbles on the edge of a vast unexplored expanse of language ocean. To us the title of a popular dictionary (Genkai) Word-Ocean is no hyperbole, but a true description of the appalling comprehensiveness of this unique tongue.

The Sambunsha announces the publication of two new dictionaries, one on Physics called Butsurigaku Jiten, compiled by the Rikwa Kenkyukai (Science Investigation Society), selling at 90 sen a copy; and one on Chinese and Japanese idioms called Jukugo Chukai Kanwa-Chijiten, compiled by Mr. Mori Totsu and selling at 1 yen a copy. This book is only 150 pages in length. The handsome binding accounts for the high price.

The Hakubunkan is about to add two more bulky magazines to its long list of monthly periodicals. One of these is the Nogyo Sekai (World of Agriculture) the first number of which will appear on April 1st. A Mr. Ishizaka, a graduate of the College of Agriculture at the Imperial University, is the editor of this new serial. In the Hakubunkan's announcement attention is drawn to the backward state of agriculture in this country. Agriculture has been affected very slightly by all the changes of the Meiji era. Japan cannot afford to allow farming to jog along its antiquated way much longer. We fail to see, however, how the discussion of theories and processes in a learned magazine is going to help the Japanese farmer, who above all things needs capital to purchase superior farming implements. The other magazine advertised by the Hakubunkan is to appear on March 15th and to be called the Bunsho Sekai (Literary World). One of its aims will be to publish well-written articles on practical subjects. It is rightly pointed out that literary students in Japan are usually profoundly ignorant of terms referring to the common things of life and are unable to write minutely about such things. The Bunshō Sekai will endeavour to do something towards raising the standard of literature by pointing out the faults and the slovenly literary habits of many modern Japanese scribblers. It promises to furnish lists of idioms, phrases, botanical terms, &c., with full explanations. There is plenty of room for an organ of this kind. There is quite a dearth of good literary magazines at present. The Teikoku Bungaku is almost exclusively run by undergraduates at the University and hence carries little weight. The Taiyō is principally a political and business organ, though it manages to publish a good number of well written articles on literature during the year. The price of the Bunshō Sekai will be 20 sen a copy. It will appear on the 15th of each month.

We are glad to be able to state that the Waseda Bungaku came to life again in January last. For years it was unrivalled as a first-class literary organ. Judging from the articles that have appeared in the new series, it bids fair to maintain its old standard of excellence.

Baron Kaneko, as we observed in a former Summary, has been stating his views on "Measures for Developing National Strength" in the Taiheiyo. The February number of that magazine contains an article on this subject, the substance of which we now proceed to give. Our future prosperity must depend largely on the development of shipbuilding and the carrying trade; as our commerce with other countries can only advance rapidly under one condition, and that is, that we ourselves do the transport work, at any rate throughout the Far East. What I wish to say on this and cognate subjects can be best said under the following headings: I.—Encouragement of Transport business and the attaining of Pre-eminence in the Oriental Coasting Trade; II.—Development and Encouragement of Commerce and Industry. III.—Military Organization in Commerce.

I.—Encouragement of Transport business and the attaining of pre-eminence in the Oriental Coasting Trade.—There are doubtless many ways of developing the carrying trade of a country, but to me it seems that the granting of subsidies to shipping companies is by far the most important. An industry like the sea transport service in its initiatory stages has so many difficulties to contend with that there is a call for the protection of the Government in a special manner. Our Government has accomplished a good deal in this line in the past, but much more needs to be done at once if we are going to utilize to the full the opportunities which our new position in the East has furnished to us. The policy of our Government has always been to encourage shipbuilding equally with navigation. It cannot do better than give more substantial support to both industries. While in America I discussed this subject with numerous business men and they said that throughout the United States there is deep regret that the Government there, while protecting other industries, has allowed shipbuilding and transport business to remain unprotected. Had protection commenced 30 years ago, the carrying trade, which is now in the hands of European countries, would have been secured by the Americans. It will now be next to impossible for them to recover lost ground as regards the trade between Europe and the States, but they have hopes of being able in time to cut out other countries in the Pacific Ocean and of thus commanding a dominant position in the trade of the Far East. As to our ability to compete with America in the carrying trade between China and the States we may have our doubts, but as to our qualifications for taking the lead in the coasting trade of the eastern world, it is not open to question. All that is wanted is energy and push on the part of our shipping companies and financial help from the Government. The former I am happy to say are at present much in evidence. There never has been so much activity in the shipping trade as has been witnessed in the past few months. If sufficient Government protection can be obtained, our pre-eminence in the carrying trade of the Far East is absolutely sure.*

II.—The Protection of Navigation and the Development and Encouragement of Commerce and Industry.—In granting subsidies to shipping companies the Government should certainly stipulate that the subsidized companies should as far as possible make use of Japanese products and manufactured goods on their ships. Coal, food, the ships' fittings, etc., should all be Japanese. Hitherto this has not been the case. We are told that as regards the various articles required on board ship, those turned out in Japan do not last and that it is hence more economical to use things made in Europe or the States. But this alleged fragility of home-made things is not irremediable by any means. The Government should take steps to bring our various industries up to a standard that will enable them to supply ships with everything they require. Thus would navigation help trade and industry in a very substantial manner. Shipping companies in receipt of subsidies should patriotically put up with somewhat inferior articles at first in order to encourage home industries.† But were the demand for the goods, appliances and articles used on ships regular and large, the supply of things of good quality by Japanese workshops and factories would certainly gradually get to be adequate.

III.—Military Organization in Commerce.—The success of our arms in the late war was largely owing to the efficiency of our military organization. There was no confusion because every part of a big machine was doing its allotted work. Had the organization been defective we should have soon found it out when it was put to the severe test of actual warfare. Our commerce and industry are carried on in a purposeless and disjointed way. There is no chief of staff and no staff officers whose duty it is to organize movements. There is no intelligence department to supply information respecting the advance of commercial foes. Our commercial warfare is a haphazard business that cannot succeed as now carried on.

Mr. K. Horiguchi, a gentleman who has just returned from Brazil, where he filled the post of secretary to the Japanese Legation for 7 years, writes in the Taiheiyo very hopefully of Japan's trade with Brazil. He invites his fellow-countrymen to go in large numbers to that country. Hitherto there have been no Japanese merchants there. The demand for Japanese goods to-day is very great, and keen German merchants are making money there hand over fist. The prices charged for articles from Japan are exorbitant. Things which sell for one yen here are going at 10 yen and 15 yen in Brazil by the hundred. Mr. Horiguchi gives an account of the Japanese goods most in request. Among them are habutaye and all kinds of porcelain. The Japanese, Mr. Horiguchi tells us, are tremendously popular in Brazil. Ever since the China-Japan war the feeling of cordiality towards the Japanese has been growing in that country, and it reached its height last year when the news of Japan's victories reached Brazil. There are many causes for the sympathy with Japan. One of the chief is the feeling that vis-à-vis Europe and America Brazil and Japan for a long time occupied the same position, being treated as inferior states. What Japan has effected Brazil hopes to accomplish. Mr. Horiguchi recommends Japanese Chambers of Commerce to send a Commissioner to Brazil to investigate the commercial situation there and then to open up regular trade with that State.

Mr. Sasaki Shinshi, one of the overseers of the * Tōyō-shōshi (Shipping Companies) no sumpatsu wa saiwai ni sono jitsu ōi ni mirubeki mono ari. Kore ni kuwauru ni Seifu no jūbun naru hogo to shōrai wa motte seba, Tōyō engan no kaiken wo nigiri, Tōyō bōeki no jikken (實權) wo kwakuho (確保) sen koto, ani hi wo kishite matsi bekarasu to sen ya!

† That surely would be going too far. Steamers would lose foreign passengers by adopting this policy. It is not only the inferiority of many things made in Japan that causes shipping companies to get their supplies from abroad, but the high prices charged in Japan and the great uncertainty as to the adequacy of the supply when goods are wanted in a hurry.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

Tōkyō Denki Tetsudō Kaisha, writes in the Taiheiyo on the continuation of the traffic tax. He thinks that if continued it should be assessed according to the length of the journey made. The electric car one sen tax is very unjust. The passenger who rides 4 miles pays the same tax as the passenger who only rides a quarter of a mile; and so on the railway. Mr. Sasaki tells us incidentally that the average takings of the Electric Tram Company to which he belongs between January 1st and 10th was over 1,300 yen per day, and the average number of passengers was over 44,300.

An interesting history of the business of the Yokohama Specie Bank and of the careers of the leading men connected with it appears in the March number of the Taiheiyo. The Bank now has branches at Tōkyō, Kōbe, Ōsaka, Nagasaki, Honolulu, San Francisco, New York, London, Lyons, Bombay, Hongkong, Shanghai, Tientsin, Peking, Newchwang, Chefoo, Port Arthur, Dairen, Mukden and Tieling.

In the Nichi Nichi Shinbun of March 5th, appears an article entitled Japanese Antonyms, by Dr. Ueda Mannen. He says, perhaps correctly, that far more attention has been given to synonyms and homonyms in the West than to antonyms. Dr. Ueda gives 3 current renderings of the term antonym: Taigo, (對語), tai-go, and taigo. As regards the study of Japanese antonyms, he does not think it has received much attention from Japanese scholars. He has of late been investigating the subject by the aid of Mr. Gubbins' Dictionary of Sino-Japanese and a Chinese work called Renbun Shakugi (連文釋義). This latter work shows that the Chinese have gone into the subject pretty thoroughly. It is perhaps true to say that in no country in the world have antonyms been brought to such a state of perfection as they have been in China and in Japan. We are not surprised to hear that Dr. Ueda has found the study a very fascinating one. He says that a history of the origin of Japanese antonyms is much to be desired.

As a rule one does not expect to find much solid reading matter in the columns of an illustrated paper, but the Kinji Gwahō, known as "The Japanese Graphic," a fortnightly paper which has now reached its 83rd number, is an exception to the rule. The March 1st number contains an excellent article on Marquis Itō from the pen of a very charming well-known writer, Mr. Yano Fumio. Marquis Itō's departure for Korea has been the signal for the appearance of several reviews of his career as a statesman. Mr. Toyabe, as will be shown later on in this Summary, holds the view that Marquis Itō's influence on Japanese politics ended with his embarkation for Seoul. But Mr. Yano, who claims to know the Marquis very thoroughly, holds that Japan can not at present dispense with the various services rendered by him. Here is the pith of Mr. Yano's article. The value of great men is not fully known until they are suddenly removed from the world or from their sphere of activity, when the immense difficulty of filling their places is realized. Marquis Itō only left this country a little while ago, but already there are not a few politicians who feel that it will never do for him to be absent from the Councils of State for any great length of time. His temporary absence impresses upon us the fact that ever since the revolution he has been one of the great pillars of state in this country. Of the very early years of the Meiji era I cannot speak confidently, but the course of events during the past quarter of a century has been watched very closely by me and I have no hesitation in saying that had there been nobody to fill the function Itō has filled so well, the development of our political institutions could never have gone on as smoothly and as satisfactorily as it has done. He has ever aimed at reconciling the old and the new, at making the passage from feudalism to constitutional government as smooth as possible. At times of great public excitement, when popular feeling has seemed to be running dangerously high, he has again and again succeeded in pouring oil on the troubled waters. His own habitual calmness is the result of a most thorough knowledge of the various situations in which this country has found itself and of the best way of dealing with each new political phase when it makes its appearance on the political stage. He has never been an opportunist. It is the opportunist who gets flurried. He has always had in his mind a settled policy, which he has sought to carry out gradually as circumstances have permitted. He has always been the enemy of sudden radical reforms. His motto has been "to make haste slowly." He has ever fulfilled the double function of the bit and the spur, the bit to restrain the rash, go-ahead reformers and the spur to move up political lag-behinds. To me it seems that the influence of Marquis Itô has saved this country from the terrible strife and bloodshed that marked the inauguration of a popular form of government in England and France. The Marquis has acted as a mediator between the despots—the great clan leaders, and the nation, and thus a transition such as the world had never before witnessed was effected in these islands in the quietest manner possible. The country has always felt that the Marquis has been a safe statesman; that he would never run the ship of state on to dangerous rocks. The Marquis has merited this confidence. His outlook has always been a wide one. A man who knows the affairs of a prefecture thoroughly is likely to blunder in the management of a single village and a man who knows the affairs of a big country is competent to assume the control of a prefecture. In these days no statesman who is ignorant of the course of events and the general tendency in the great outside world can be trusted implicitly to govern his own country. The eyes of the Marquis have ever been on the outside world and no serious step has been taken by him without considering its connection with other countries (Hitori Kô (Marquis) ni itate wa sono chakugan tsune ni sekai zentai ni wataru oru ga yuge ni, waga kokuji wo sho (説) suru tsune ni kono sumpô yori wari-dasazaru koto nashi). He has ever striven to so adjust our State affairs that they might be in keeping with movements in other States. The Marquis is a unique personality in our political world. In character there may be others that resemble him, but they do not possess his minute knowledge of home and foreign affairs. There may be men who have as much knowledge as he has, but they have not his character. Though a Japanese statesman, it has been for many years past his ambition to govern like a western statesman. The model statesman that he has in his mind is a man of a distinctly occidental type. And yet the peculiar thing is that the Marquis has never been a wide reader of European or American books. His reading is chiefly confined to books in his own language. On this point I can speak with confidence, having been privileged to examine his library. . . . The Marquis is essentially a man of simple habits. In the matter of the acquisition of property he has little or no ambition. In his relations with other men he is guided by special circumstances. He neither backs any one man through thick and thin because he happens to be a friend nor does he refuse to employ men who have been hostile to him in times past when situations have altered. From the administration of public affairs it is ever his practice to banish pettiness and personal preferences or hostility. With every turn of the tangled path through which our Meiji politics have passed the Marquis is so familiar that the nation has grown accustomed to look to him for advice on all occasions. I must confess to a slight feeling of insecurity now that he is absent from us, and I for one pray for his speedy return to the country whose destinies he has guided so long.

"Two Planets of the Itô Solar System" is the title of a very discerning article from the pen of Mr. Toyabe Shuntai, which appears in the March Tatô. The political situation in Japan to-day is full of complications, and it is not always easy to see to what harbour the ship of State is drifting. To Mr. Toyabe it appears that party government in this country is further off than ever. In view of the proposed arbitrary action of the Saionji Cabinet connected with the State purchase of the railways not a few writers are saying that genuine constitutional government, while accepted in theory, is ignored in administration in this country. The two planets on which Mr. Toyabe writes are Barons Kaneko and Suyematsu. The following is what he has to say on the careers of these two prominent politicians. They have both been engaged in a somewhat peculiar and delicate mission in England and America. They were sent to those countries to answer such anti-Japanese articles as would be likely to appear in newspapers and magazines during the late war. They did their work well and the public here seems to have expected that they would be rewarded by the occupation of seats in the new Cabinet. Their positions as statesmen seem to have warranted this expectation. But Baron Kaneko has been appointed Privy-Councillor and Baron Suyematsu, if report be true, will be sent abroad as a Minister or Ambassador. Not only have they been excluded from the Cabinet, but younger men have been elevated to the charge of portfolios over their heads. How is this striking political phenomenon to be explained? In the first place, most people seem to overlook the fact that Marquis Saionji's attitude to Marquis Itô's various planets has recently been marked by extreme coldness. There are reasons for this. Marquis Itô's influence on Japanese politics has long since been on the wane. As for strong attachment between Marquis Itô and the men who are regarded as his planets or his satellites, it has never existed. Marquis Itô appreciates talent wherever he finds it, but he has never shown any tendency to contract strong political friendships. . . . While using various agents, he has never felt solely dependent on any of them. So what is known as the Itô party among politicians is lacking in cohesion. The bonds that bind Itô's followers to the Marquis are very weak and are growing weaker every day. This consideration, no doubt, guided Marquis Saionji when he selected the members of the present Cabinet. Hitherto it has been our custom to regard Marquis Itô's party as the great rival of the Yamagata Party, but with the transference of the Marquis to Korea his political career may be said to have ended. (Itô kô no Rankoku Tokan (結案) taru wa kore wo hare ga seijiteki jigyo no shuketsu to mitomubeshi). And, unless Count Okuma's Shimpotô should come to the front in a more decided manner than it is now doing, it is tolerably safe to predict that when the Saionji Cabinet falls we shall see either another Katsura Cabinet or a Yamagata Cabinet or a Kodama Cabinet. Which of the three leaders will come into power it is hard to predict now, but nothing is plainer than the fact that the Itô faction's days are numbered. Among the followers of Marquis Itô there are to-day no greater men than the two Barons who have lately returned from England and America. And what do we see? Both of them resemble planets that have lost their sun and which are wandering aimlessly in space. Neither one of them is sufficiently great to stand alone in the political world. (Ryô danshaku wa motoyori Bunô (文王) naku shite okoru no goketsu ni arazu).† But it is quite plain that they can no longer be content to rely on the remaining force of the Itô momentum (daryoku (情力)) in our political world. They must strike out in some way or other on lines of their own. At one time they were both active workers in the ranks of the Seiyûkai. They figured largely in all the proceedings of the party. The change of presidency did not seem to affect their position in the councils of party. But what have they gained politically by their lengthy connection with the Seiyûkai? Nothing substantial. They find themselves politically no better off to-day than

* This remains to be seen. Mr. Yano's opinion given above is in direct opposition to this theory.

† Highly figurative. Bunô was the name of a famous Chinese Emperor (Wan-wang) who patronized promising men. (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

Itô Miyoji who has always kept aloof from the party. The two barons having thoroughly imbibed English and American notions as to party politics, they are, one would think, eminently fitted to play an important part in the development of party-government in this country. But the fact is that we are still miles distant from the English and American stage of party politics. This country is not ready to make a proper use of such types of politicians as are represented by these two Occidentalized statesmen. The whole system of our Japanese politics is still in a terribly backward condition. The methods of selecting candidates for Diet membership, the methods of influencing and controlling the members after their election will not bear close scrutiny. Corruption abounds everywhere, and so it happens that the right kind of men are not chosen. The relation of municipal government to national government in this country is not what it ought to be. The influence of local officials is perpetually employed in the interests of the party in power in Tôkyô in an unfair manner. The members chosen are given to jobbery, egged on perpetually by their electors. Political parties in this country are gradually losing the respect of the enlightened and well-informed section of the nation. Taking the educated world to-day, it may be said, speaking roughly, that one half of the brightest young men seek office under the Government, and the other half turn to business of some kind or other. Those who possess votes place little value on them. To them the selection of a member of the Diet possesses no interest whatever. Much as we may regret this state of affairs as well-wishers of constitutional government, facts cannot be got rid of. Marquis Itô tried his best to clarify the political air, but that he failed nobody knows better than he. Baron Kaneko has now left the Seiyûkai, and he has probably left it in despair of ever effecting any great change in the rank and file of that party. He had a good opportunity of attempting this when he succeeded Hoshi Tôru as the leading member of the party in the Tôkyô Municipal Council. But he found that he could do no more than suppress a few of the wild excesses that had grown up under a rowdy-loving leader like Hoshi Tôru. Beyond this he could not go. He attempted to control the Seiyûkai much after the fashion of Marquis Itô. He decided on measures without consulting other members of the party, and so gradually he lost his popularity and even became the butt of ridicule. I say this to show that his leaving the party now is not in consequence of his acceptance of a seat in the Privy Council. . . . The two barons are very different in disposition. Baron Kaneko is naturally of a retiring disposition, while Baron Suyematsu is one of the go-ahead, pushing sort of men. The Itô influence in the political world being gone, Baron Suyematsu will either join the Yamagata faction or he will, within the pale of the Seiyûkai, make his power felt in the country, if, indeed, under the present leadership of that party such a course is possible.

Looking closely at our political world to-day one cannot but feel that the whole future of political parties and factions in this country is very uncertain. There is a growing feeling of contempt for political parties and not a few are beginning to feel that it is an honour not to belong to them. When men perceived a few months ago that notwithstanding the fact that Marquis Saionji is the President of the Seiyûkai he was obliged to concede to the wishes of the former Premier to such an extent as to choose men to fill Cabinet seats from the ranks of officialdom, leaving the Seiyûkai to a large extent out in the cold, they naturally at once jumped to the conclusion that in the political arena of Japan to-day political parties count for little. If the powerful Seiyûkai made such a poor show, what hope is there for smaller bodies? The country believes in officials, because among them there is knowledge and character. The only hope for political parties must come from their possessing a better set of men taken all round than officialdom can show. This Marquis Itô knew when he formed the Seiyûkai. But he failed to bring the party up to the required standard. Marquis Saionji cannot be said to have succeeded any better than his predecessor. The party has gone on degenerating in every way. So Marquis Saionji knows he does not rely on it at this crisis. His position in the Cabinet to-day is dependent on the Yamagata faction, that is, upon the pro-official and anti-party politicians. Yamagata's followers have shaken themselves free from clannism. Their conviction is that permanent officials in Japan to-day supply the best material for the formation of future Cabinets. They are anti-party politicians to the heart's core. They dominate the political world and the only hope of effecting their overthrow lies in the possibility of a union being effected between Count Okuma and Marquis Itô. Count Okuma is known to desire this, but he naturally expects Marquis Itô to be the one to make the first move towards bringing it about. The two statesmen, working together could doubtless rehabilitate party politicians in an effective manner. The situation is critical as far as the parties are concerned. When Marquis Itô will return to this country nobody knows. In the meanwhile, Count Okuma may die and his party lose its coherency. Yamagata's party does not depend on him at all for its strength. It is a big official body that is not dependent on skillful leadership. Its coherency is assured by identity of interests in the members of the great organization and its popularity will last as long as it displays administrative ability of a higher order than that shown by its rivals the political party magnates. The compactness of the great official association to-day forms a striking contrast to the disjointed character of the organizations known as political parties, whose members are like a flock of crows that come and go as they please. Marquis Itô's name will always be held in esteem by high and low in this country on account of his personal worth, his many meritorious services and his great talents. But in party organization he has signally failed. The Itô faction is now utterly powerless in the State (Itô yuru Itô kei naru mono wa, imaya Seijikai ni yite nanka no seiryoku mo yû suru mono ni arazu); all those who have hitherto depended on the spell attached to the great statesman's name will have henceforth to shift for themselves. Among these the two barons who have lately returned to our shores naturally attract most attention. They will no doubt both make careers for themselves later on, but the position in which they find themselves to-day is so largely the result of the trend of political opinion and the general tendency of affairs in this country that we owe no apology to them for discussing their cases so minutely. We would not be understood as expressing concern for their future nor do we wish them to think that we advocate their entire renunciation of political parties. We do not attach any blame to Marquis Itô for what has happened. The wagging of our political world not even a Marquis Itô can control, and it has wagged in such a way that two promising statesmen are by the force of uncontrollable circumstances left out in the cold. That is all. But it is with the spirit of the age, rather than the destinies of individual statesmen that we are most concerned. Individuals, however strong swimmers they may be, are swept along by irresistible political currents.

DEPARTURE OF PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

Bright sunshine but blustery winds—typical of March in this portion of Japan—marked the departure of His Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught for home. The Prince left the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace at 11.30 a.m. on March 16th, being escorted to the railway station by the Imperial Reception Committee, Sir Claude MacDonald, British Ambassador, and his staff and a troop of cavalry. The cavalcade duly reached Shinbashi Railway Station and found there the Princes and Princesses of the Blood, the Ministers of State, a number of Peers, and high officers of the Army and Navy, who were gathered on the platform to bid bon voyage to the distinguished visitor and his suite. The streets of the capital through which he passed were tastefully decorated with British and Japanese flags intertwined and the citizens tendered His Royal Highness their most enthusiastic cheers. At 11.50 a.m., the Royal train left for Yokohama. At Yokohama Railway Station, a distinguished party were present, including Admiral Kamimura, Commander of the Yokosuka Naval Station; Admiral Kataoka, Commander of the First Squadron; the Commanders of the Izumo, Yakumo, Iwate, Asahi, Chiyoda, Otowa, Adzuma, Yayeyama, and six destroyers Arare, Yayoi, Ariake, Fubuki, Oboro, and Akebono, now in Yokohama harbour; Governor Sufu, Secretary Taniguchi, and Councillor Sakata, of Kanagawa-kencho; Mr K. Hashimoto, Director of the Yokohama Post Office; Mr. Ishida, Director of the Yokohama Harbour Office, Mayor Ichihara; the British Consul-General, Mr. J. Carey Hall, I.S.O., and his staff; the representatives of various public bodies, etc. Three companies of bluejackets from the Iwate were present as a guard of honour under command of Lieutenant Tsuchido. The Royal train arrived at 12.28 p.m. His Royal Highness entered the carriage awaiting him, and in company with Lord Redesdale and General Baron Kuroki drove to the Yokohama United Club through Honcho-dori, Nippon-odori, past the British Consulate and the Kencho, and along the Bund. As His Highness drove along the Bund the Asahi fired a salute of twenty-one guns in his honour. At the Y. U. Club the Prince was received by the President and Committee and was shown through the stately building. At 1.10 p.m., His Highness left the Club and drove to the Oriental Palace Hotel, where he was entertained to lunch by members of the British Community. In reply to the toast of his health the Prince said:

I thank you sincerely for your speech, for the kindly sentiments it conveys, and for the good wishes it expresses.

It has been a great privilege to me to have been entrusted by the King of England with the high Mission, now fulfilled, to His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan, as it has given me the opportunity of seeing a country, whose beauty is proverbial, and of meeting a chivalrous, highly educated and energetic people whose kindness, hospitality and courtesy is beyond expression.

Everywhere, and from everyone, in Japan I have received the warmest and most unaffected welcome, and I sincerely hope that this outburst of goodwill is the expression of sentiment towards our beloved Mother Country, with whom Japan is now so happily allied, and with you I trust it is a good augury for the future.

I shall not fail to convey the expressions of loyalty and goodwill from so many of the subjects of the King in this Empire to His Majesty, whose anxiety for their welfare and prosperity extends equally to those at home and abroad, and who is always glad to hear of the loyal sentiments of those over whom it is his happiness to reign.

It is needless to say that Japanese town and the foreign settlement were fully decorated in honour of the Prince, and that all the vernacular papers published lengthy farewell articles in which they expressed profound thanks for his visit and prayed for his safe and pleasant voyage. All these courtesies were worded in the most poetical terms. All the warships and merchantmen in harbour were fully dressed. At the pier, two companies of bluejackets under Sub-Lieut. Iida were drawn up, the whole of the naval guard being under Commander Yamazaki, of the cruiser Adzuma. At half past 2 o'clock, the pier was crowded by foreign residents, Japanese officials and citizens of Yokohama. The band from the Yokosuka naval station was present and played a stirring selection of airs pending the Prince's arrival. At 3 p.m. many beautiful day fire-works were sent up in the enclosure of the Customs. Meanwhile His Royal Highness drove to the pier from the Oriental Palace Hotel and proceeded to the Empress of Japan, being warmly cheered by the crowd. General Baron Kuroki, Admiral Togo, and others of the Imperial Reception Committee, Lady MacDonald, and the British Ambassador, and other notables went on board the steamer to bid final farewell. After the last warning bell was rung, the Reception Committee assembled on the pier, and His Royal Highness appeared on the starboard side in company with General Sir Thomas Kelly Kenny, Admiral of the Fleet Sir Edward Seymour, and Mr. Miles W. Lampson. Mr. Lampson took a snap-shot of the Imperial Reception Committee with his camera and then the Prince taking the camera from Mr. Lampson himself attempted to photograph the Japanese notables—Mr. Nagasaki, Master of the Board of the Ceremonies, Admiral Togo, General Baron Kuroki, and Governor Sufu were in the front line; Messrs. Watanabe and Asada, Masters of Ceremonies in the rear. The incident drew forth another round of cheering. As the ship began to move away from the pier, His Royal Highness appeared on the bridge and stood at salute as the crowd raised a final cheer and waved hats and handkerchiefs. Subsequently as the ship passed through the entrance of the breakwater, fire-works were again discharged liberating various fancy figures.

The warships of the First Squadron under Admiral Kataoka and destroyers escorted the Royal Mail steamer down the Bay, torpedo-boat No. 64 taking the lead.

Previous to his departure from Japan, His Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught handed to the British Ambassador the sum of five thousand yen for distribution amongst Japanese charities.

On March 15th Baron Ozawa, Vice-Director of the Japan Red Cross Society, waited upon the Prince at the Kasumigaseki Palace and presented him with the medal of the Society. H. R. H. accepted the honorary membership of the Society.

The same day, Sir Claude MacDonald, the British Ambassador, presented the following address to Marquis Saionji, Premier, expressing the appreciation felt by Prince Arthur of Connaught:—

"Before leaving Japan His Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught is anxious to find some means of expressing his deep pleasure and gratitude at the magnificent reception he has received on all sides during his stay in the country, and I therefore have the honour in obedience to the request of His Royal Highness, to transmit the following message to your Excellency:—

The exceptional honours shown by His Imperial Majesty the Emperor to His Royal Highness Prince Arthur of Connaught struck the keynote of welcome which has re-echoed everywhere throughout the visit.

The kindness and friendship shown by the Imperial Family, the splendid entertainments given by the Ministers of War and Marine, the Business Men of Tokyo, and by the Mayor and Citizens of Tokyo have all been accentuated by the manifestations of cordial welcome which accompanied them.

The warmth and extent of the demonstrations which attended Prince Arthur during the whole of his unofficial tour in Southern Japan touched him very greatly and have made an impression which can never be effaced.

His Royal Highness has duly reported these evidences of friendship and goodwill to His Majesty the King, who has expressed the greatest pleasure and satisfaction at hearing of the magnificent welcome offered to His Special Envoy on the important Mission with which he has been charged.

In leaving this country, where his stay has been rendered so undeniably happy, Prince Arthur cannot help regarding the marks of kindness and welcome shown to him as evidences of the wish to cement the Alliance which now so happily exists between the two countries.

I avail myself of this opportunity, Monsieur le Ministre, to renew to your Excellency the assurance of my highest consideration."

Prince Arthur decorated Messrs. K. Saigo and K. Uyemura, mayors of Kyoto and Kagoshima respectively, and Major-General H. Aoyama, Commander of the Kyoto Brigade, with the Victorian Order.

THE GERMANS IN BRAZIL.

We have received the following from the Brazilian Minister in Tokyo:—

Under the above title and with the apparent and commendable purpose of stimulating Japanese emigration to South America there appeared a few days ago in the Nichi Nichi Shimbun an article, a summary of which was reproduced in the Japan Times and the Japan Mail, in which mention is made of the progress of Germany in Brazil since the year 1897, not only as to emigration, but as to her commercial expansion in that part of the American Continent.

The writer, however, went too far and certainly exaggerated, not only the present preponderance of Germans in the Brazilian State of Santa Catharina, which he describes as already an imperium in imperio, but also the preponderance which he supposes will exist in the future.

Brazil, like all nations of America, is a country which receives immigrants. The extent of territory which all those nations have at their disposal, the smallness of their actual population and specially their reasonable desire to grow, lead to that. It is for this reason that those nations spend every year large sums in order to promote and stimulate foreign immigration.

In that way the northern republic of the United States of America has been put on the footing of a great world power, as she now is, whose example all her sisters on the American Continent try to follow. The present population of Brazil is about twenty millions and her area nine million square kilometers, that is to say, eighteen times as large as that of Japan, France or Spain. There is therefore room enough in Brazil for 400 millions of people to live easily. We receive immigrants mostly from Italy, Portugal, Spain and Germany, and by the constitution of the Republic all children of foreigners born on our soil are Brazilian citizens. If Brazil, which is above all a free and most liberal country, in which there is no State religion, although the great majority of Brazilians are Catholics, shows the greatest tolerance towards the habits and ways of living of the immigrants whom she receives, she does so with the plain purpose of not raising obstacles, but on the contrary of stimulating more and more the incoming of foreigners.

There are no race prejudices in Brazil. Even the negroes, of whom we have a great many, have never been despised by the white people. They enjoy all rights belonging to Brazilian citizenship, not only by law but in fact.

The impression likely to be left in the mind of the reader by the article in the Nichi Nichi Shimbun is that there exists in the south of the American Continent an extensive territory, which stands in relation to the covetousness of the great European powers as China stood until a short time ago.

The writer shows himself very ill-informed about things American, when he ventures upon such a suggestion. In America foreigners do not absorb anything; they are themselves absorbed by the great mass of their surroundings, when they land on our shores. No one of the sons of the immigrants from the countries above mentioned thinks for one moment of abjuring the country of his birth.

A striking example of what has been said above is found in the Argentine Republic, whose population of five millions includes one million foreigners and, of the remainder, two millions are the descendants of Italians. These do not absorb anything for the country of their ancestors, but on the contrary, have been assimilated by their surroundings. Nobody has ever had any idea of setting up an Italian empire in that prosperous republic, whose presidency has already once been held by an illustrious son of an Italian family, and, as is well known, the number of Germans in Brazil in proportion to the whole population is now, and always will be, much smaller. By the end of this century, as the writer predicts, we shall have received, and let us say en passant, with pleasure and profit to our nationality, twenty or thirty millions of Germans, but by that time the descendants of the other Brazilians of Portuguese, Italian and Spanish origin will have increased to a number three or four times as large. Also the Germans born there will be as good Brazilians as the others.

We have already a prominent son of German parents as a member of the Government, and there is nothing to prevent our having to-morrow as the President of the Republic a descendant from the same stock, if he happens to have the indispensable requisites for such a high position and to be favoured with the vote of the Nation.

Let the writer go on encouraging the emigration of his countrymen to our country. They will be welcome. The Brazilians will receive with open arms to cooperate with them in their work of progress and civilisation the valiant sons of the land of the Rising Sun.

THE LAW COURTS.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

The trial of Mr. Kono and other politicians, who are charged with having instigated the Tokyo disturbances, was resumed on March 16th in the Tokyo District Court. Several witnesses were examined.

Matsu Yoshizawa, wife of Fujio Yoshiwa, one of the accused, who was alleged at the first trial to be a spy employed by the Metropolitan Police Office, deposed that on Sept. 18th last, she was summoned to the detectives' section of the Police office. Detective Kano gave her five yen and promised to assist her household to the extent of fifteen yen every month until her husband should be acquitted. At the acquittal of her husband, the office would give him five hundred yen. After two or three days, when she paid a visit to the office with the view of seeing her husband in a detention ward, she received fifty yen from a man who was probably a detective. Messrs Kono and Miyazaki, detectives, told her not to spend money so extravagantly as to attract the attention of the public. Her husband was supplied with foreign food. She added that the policemen told her that her husband was to be sent abroad at official expense if he did not care to stay in Japan after his acquittal.

Mr. Miyazaki, of the Metropolitan Police Office, was examined. Many of his replies were, "I don't know," or "I do not remember." At this stage, Mr. Takagi and a few lawyers employed for the defence referred to previous replies of the detective and insisted that he was committing perjury. They asked the Court to arrest him on a charge of giving false statements.

Mr. Kano, another detective, was also examined. His evidence was almost similar to that of the previous witness.

Finally Mr. S. Miyauchi, a police inspector, and Mr. M. Watanabe, Director of the First Section of the Metropolitan Police Office, were examined. The principal points of their statements were that they could not give details as the enquiries were all connected with secret police affairs. The lawyers for the defence again insisted that the statements of the witnesses were perjured and asked the Court to arrest them at once and to remove them for examination. Public Procurators Anju and Sugimoto contended that their statements could not be dealt with under the Penal Code. The Court rejected the request of the lawyers.

Mr. Takagi, one of the Counsel, said that he could not attend longer as Counsel and at once retired from the Court.

Other Counsel asked the Court to examine Mr. Ikemoto of the Niroku Shimbun and five others as witnesses. The Court rejected the request, after which the trial was adjourned till March 23rd.

CLAIM FOR SHORT DELIVERY.

On March 16th, in the Yokohama District Court, the hearing of a case filed by Messrs. Siber Wolf and Co. against the China Mutual S.S. Co. and the Ocean S.S. Co. (whose Yokohama agents are Messrs. Butterfield and Swire) claiming yen 1,541.80 for short delivery of cargo, was resumed.

The parties' Counsel repeated their statements submitted at the previous proceedings, after which defendants' Counsel asked the Court for leave to examine Mr. C. Helm, of Messrs. Helm Bros., and Mr. Hattori, manager of the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha, as expert witnesses on the landing of cargo, and plaintiffs' Counsel, called for the presence of Kobayashi, an employee of Capt. Weston. The Court decided to summon the witnesses required by the plaintiffs' Counsel. The case was adjourned till March 27th.

A COLLISION CASE.

The Osaka Court of First Instance gave judgment on Tuesday in the action brought by the family of the late Rev. H. G. Appenzeller against the Osaka Shosen Kaisha for compensation for that gentleman's death in a steamer collision. The Court ordered the Osaka Shosen Kaisha to pay yen 8,000 each to Mrs. Appenzeller and her four children.

Mr. Appenzeller was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church Mission at Seoul, and in voyaging from Chemulpo to Mokpo, in 1902, on board the O.S.K. steamer Kumagata Maru, a collision occurred with the same Company's Kusumoto Maru on or about June 13, when he was drowned. Various litigation took place, but last year the present suit was filed, asking damages of yen 110,000 for the widow and children, the amount being fixed on the basis of the lost emolument of the missionary and consolation damages of yen 6,000 apiece to each of the five members of deceased's family. Mr. Masujima appeared for plaintiff and Mr. Sanagawa of Osaka for defendants and the case was ably argued on both sides with the result stated.—Kobe Herald.

CLAIM FOR INSURANCE PREMIUMS.

The hearing of a case filed by Mr. George R. Davis, President of the Manchester Assurance Co., Manchester, Great Britain, against Mr. H. C. Litchfield, Administrator of the estate of the late Mr. N. P. Kingdon, of Messrs. Kingdon, Schwabe & Co., claiming yen 17,026.35, was resumed on March 16th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nagata.

Mr. Arthur Kingdon, son of the late Mr. N. P. Kingdon, was summoned as a witness at the request of the plaintiffs' Counsel.

Defendant's Counsel presented an objection to the witness on the ground that he had a close connection with the estate and consequently should not be examined as a witness in the case.

Plaintiff's Counsel said that during his father's life time, Mr. Arthur Kingdon attended to the business books of the insurance transactions of the plaintiff. According to Clause 4 of Art. 299 of Civil Code Procedure Mr. Kingdon might be examined as a witness.

Defendant's Counsel insisted on his objection in accordance with Clause 4 of Art. 298 of the Code and contended that Mr. Kingdon was directly interested in the estate.

The Court decided not to examine Mr. Kingdon, after which plaintiffs' Counsel asked the Court to summon a competent accountant to examine the business books used by the late Mr. N. P. Kingdon while acting as agent of the Manchester Assurance Co. The Court consented to the request.

The hearing was adjourned sine die.

THE ALLEGED MURDER OF A POET.

The first trial of Takebayashi Osaburo (formerly Noguchi Osaburo; he was recently divorced from the Noguchi family and as a result, his register was returned to his original house) took place on March 19th in the Tokyo District Court before Judge Imanura and Public Procurator Shimidzu. Messrs. Hanai, Ogawa, Saito, Harada, Sasaki, Ohara and Indo, lawyers, were employed for the defence.

The Public Procurator made a statement in which he referred to the various charges: (1) the murder of a youth named Kawai Sosuke; (2) the forgery of official and private letters; (3) the murder of the well-known poet, Noguchi Neisai, elder brother of the accused's former wife; (4) the murder of Tsudzuki, a drug merchant.

After the conclusion of the speech by the Public Procurator, a lengthy examination took place. The accused said that after becoming acquainted with Soye, the younger sister of Mr. Noguchi Neisai, he found that the poet was suffering from leprosy. He immediately endeavoured to find a remedy for the disease, and read several books with reference to medicine in the Uyeno Library with a view to treating the patient. His efforts, however, were futile. Referring to the allegation that the accused murdered the youth, Kawai Sosuke, and cut off a portion of his flesh and made soup from it to give to his patient, the Court asked the accused whether he found an old story on these lines while reading the books in the library. The accused replied that he did not find any story that human flesh was a good remedy for leprosy. He contended that he did not know of the murder of the youth. As to the suspicion that he forged a certificate of the Foreign Language School, he refused to admit the charge. The examination was extended to the murder of the poet. The accused said that what he had stated at the preliminary examination was all baseless. Finally he confessed that he murdered the drug merchant by strangling him.

At this stage, the trial was adjourned till April 6th.

APPEAL OF A POLICEMAN.

The appeal of Y. Imuda, a police officer of the Honjo Station, Tokyo, has been dismissed in the Tokyo Appeal Court. This officer, it may be remembered, was sentenced in the Tokyo District Court to nine months' imprisonment with hard labour on a charge of having assaulted a man and inflicted severe injuries on him with his sword during the disturbances with reference to the peace treaty.

CLAIM FOR CHIP-BRAID.

The hearing of a case in which R. Tanaka, a chip-braid merchant, claims yen 696.83 from Messrs Carlowitz and Co., was resumed on March 22nd in the Yokohama District Court.

Y. Sudzuki, a farmer residing in the village of Chofu, near Shinagawa, was examined as a witness. He deposed that he was employed by the plaintiff from the middle of October, 1904, to the end of November, 1905. While in that employment, he had to carry chip-braid or other similar goods to the office of Messrs. Carlowitz and Co. and other foreign firms. Referring to Exhibit A 2-3, witness stated that the plaintiff gave him a memorandum whenever he was ordered to carry merchandise to a foreign firm. The note was in counterfoil. One half was an invoice and the other was a receipt to be signed by the receiver of the goods. As he did not understand English, he could not say exactly which were the receipts returned by Messrs. Carlowitz and Co. duly signed. In October last, he carried five cars of chip-braid to the defendant firm.

Cross-examined by the defendants' Counsel, witness said that the plaintiff ordered from K. Ishiwatari, a chip-braid manufacturer in the village of Rokugo, Kawasaki, whenever the former received orders from foreign firms. He did not know anything about the agreement between the manufacturer and the plaintiff.

At this stage, the Court decided to summon K. Ishiwatari, for whose presence the defendants' Counsel had asked the Court at the previous hearing.

The case was adjourned till March 31st.

CLAIM FOR SALARY.

In the Yokohama Local Court a case filed by a Chinaman named Ching Supao, No. 3,178, Negishi, Yokohama, against Mr. John W. Cain, the representative of the Yangtze Insurance Association, No. 70, came up on March 22nd.

Plaintiff was absent and unrepresented and defendant was represented by Mr. H. Nakamura.

The purport of the plaintiff's petition was that the Chinaman was employed by Mr. Cain from August, 1903, to July 31st, 1905. When he left, the defendant did not pay his salary, forty yen for the last month.

Plaintiff's claim was dismissed on the ground that he was absent and unrepresented.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Colonels R. Hasegawa and S. Ofu have been promoted to the rank of Major-General.

Mr. Yamada, Japanese Consul in Lyons, wired on March 17th to the Foreign Office that a good business in raw silk was being done and prices were steady.

Fire broke out on March 15th in Matsue destroying two hundred and fifty houses.

The training squadron under Rear-Admiral Shimamura left Shanghai on March 16th.

The first section of the Peking-Kalgan railway, from Fengtai to Nankao, is now open to traffic.

It is officially announced that the Ikoma, a sister ship to the cruiser Tsukuba, will be launched on April 9th at Kure.

The Kumano Maru and seven other transports have been released at Ujina. Before the end of March, seven other transports will be discharged.

Mrs. Luke, author of the well known hymn, "I think when I read that sweet story of old," died at her home, Newport, Isle of Wight, on the 2nd ult, aged 97.

An official telegram says that the withdrawal of the soldiers through Liushutung was completed on March 14th. Some ten detachments now remain in Manchuria.

The death is announced, at Buenos Aires, of President Quintana of the Argentine Republic. Mr. Quintana was the Delegate from Argentine at the International Congress held in Washington.

Vice-Admiral Sir Arthur William Moore, new commander of the British Squadron in China seas, in succession to Admiral Sir Gerard Noel, arrived at Hongkong on March 14th, by the cruiser King Alfred.

A youth named T. Konishi, from Kyoto, attempted to commit suicide on March 19th at a small hotel called Shimura in Takashima-cho, Yokohama, severely injuring himself in the breast with a revolver. Monetary difficulties are reported to have been the cause.

In reporting the launch of the new N.Y.K. steamer Ishikari Maru (1,100) at the Kawasaki Dockyard on Wednesday, the Kobe Herald takes occasion to remark that the Kawasaki Company is building at present nine gunboats of the Kiang Yuen type, of 700 tons each, and four 2nd class torpedo boats, for the Imperial Chinese Government; three 3,500 ton passenger boats for the N.Y.K., and two 2,500 ton vessels of similar class for the O.S.K. The Company also has in hand one despatch boat and four more torpedo-boat destroyers for the Japanese Government.

No man in the Church better deserves the honour of a Prebendal Stall in St. Paul's Cathedral than the Rev. W. Carlile, who has been offered the position from which Canon Paget is about to retire on becoming Suffragan Bishop of Ipswich. Mr. Carlile's work as honorary organising secretary of the Church Army has been of a character to evoke the admiration of everyone interested in the problem of the unemployed, and their Majesties have been foremost in encouraging his magnificent efforts among the "submerged tenth." To Mr. Carlile can be applied in full measure the description of "muscular Christianity." There is nothing pauperising about the methods of the Church Army; its chief has no sympathy with the loafer and the professional tramp. A readiness to work is the "open sesame" to the benefits of this most practical organisation.

The Anglo-Russian tells the following awful story of how Russian sanitary officers, collecting the wounded, put aside for burial those of them who in their opinion were not likely to recover. One of these "should be buried" now speaks as follows:—

After each battle the sanitaries would mark with red paint those wounded who were to be taken away for treatment, and with black paint those apparently hopelessly wounded who were to be left on the field and buried with the dead. I myself was lying on the ground when a hand touched me, and then proceeded to fetch the black paint. I fully realised my fate, and said: "I may recover. How can you act like this?" "Have you money?" the man asked. "Yes," I replied. "How much?" "Ten roubles." "Give them to me." He just managed to put the money in his pocket and was stretching out his hand for the red paint, when tra-a-akh—the enemy's shrapnell struck him dead! I lay and listened, but not a sound came from him. Then I thought why should I lose my money, and gathering strength I crept up to him, and began to search his pockets, when, to my astonishment, I found not only my ten roubles, but more than 300! The soldier's statement about burying alive the hopelessly wounded is corroborated by many more eye-witnesses, who tell of it as of quite an ordinary occurrence.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE UYENO CONCERT AFFAIR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In this morning's issue you quote an article from the Jiji Shimpō dealing with the Uyeno Concert scare. In his article the writer still keeps up the farce of pretending that the feeling of nervousness started with the audience and led to the breaking up of the performance. Your own report at the time, which also supported this view, was written either with a desire to modify the facts, or by a reporter who received his information second-hand. Why this concealment and repeated perversion of what really took place? The only explanation seems to be a desire to prevent the Japanese officials from appearing ridiculous, but if so it is unjust to the audience that they should be saddled with the charge of having caused such an abrupt termination of what promised to be an exceptionally good concert. Is it for a moment likely that residents in the Far East, accustomed to earthquakes and harped almost to indifference, would have shown the white feather in the presence of a Royal visitor owing to a feeling of "nervousness"? Has a meeting ever before been abandoned for such an absurd reason? There is only one answer to such a question. Reuter's "version," as you term it, is the truth, and everyone present would endorse what was stated. I stand open to correction, but I believe the facts are these:—

A messenger from the Imperial Household Department came in during the performance and walking up to a Japanese in some way connected with the British Embassy held a whispered conversation with him. This gentleman, an interpreter, I believe, then spoke to Sir Claude MacDonald, who thereupon addressed the Prince. Shortly after this His Highness accompanied by the Princesses and attended by his suite left the hall—not "slipped out," as asserted. It was assumed by most that he had retired for refreshments, and the audience kept their seats in expectation of his return. To the general regret a request was made by persons moving amongst the audience that we should leave as quietly as possible, since word had just been received from the meteorological office that the seismograph was acting in a peculiar way and that an exceptionally severe shock was expected at any moment. Although many were dubious as to the "foretelling" powers of the office yet it was thought wise to follow the advice given, especially when it was stated that the performance would be discontinued. To maintain that the audience was the first to show anxiety or desire to leave is a deliberate misstatement of facts. The simplest way is to ask the favour of an interview with Sir Claude MacDonald and give his "version" without any journalistic distortion or suppression.

Did a messenger arrive from the Imperial Household Department or was it merely a badger in the Imperial livery? Did the Prince "slip away" unnoticed? Who made the first move, the audience or the Prince? Is it true that Prince Arthur wished to remain but was urged to leave? Did the meteorological office want to "save face" over its unfulfilled prediction, or was it a hoax, pure and simple? Now, the Japanese do not indulge in practical jokes of this description, and, further, they would not be so wanting in courtesy as to play jokes upon a royal guest. The messenger from the Imperial Household should inform the public how he came to be hoaxed, or how his superiors were. Later on we should like to know how the Mail and Jiji Shimpō were "hoaxed" into giving reports so utterly at variance with facts.

Yours truly,

ONE WHO WAS THERE.

"THE PEARL BUDDHA."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Here is the end of a letter which has come from an American friend of mine. "If you have any knowledge of a 'Pearl Buddha,' I shall be grateful for information concerning it; a friend wishes to know about it." I have enquired here and there about a Pearl Buddha, but in vain. If you, or any of your readers know anything about it I shall be very grateful for the information.

I would also take advantage of this opportunity to apprise the Rev. W. H. Smart that he is not the only foreign missionary in Fukushima Ken. Some thirty years ago, one or two Catholic missionaries took up their residence in Wakamatsu, Aizu. Though Aizu is part of Fukushima Ken, it has not this year, comparatively speaking, suffered so severely from the famine as have other districts. Nevertheless apart from some villages in Yamaguchi, distress is deep everywhere. Some children cannot go to school because they have no clothes, and many others are simply clad in tatters, the cast off remnants of their elders' clothing. One cannot help calling to mind as we see these poor little children the words of the great Cardinal Manning:

Children's tears not wiped away,
Call upon God as loud as blood shed on the ground.

Yours very faithfully, F. F. CORGIER,
Miss. Ap.
Wakamatsu, Aizu, Fukushima-Ken.

BRITISH REVENUE SURPLUS.

London, March 15.
The British revenue returns indicate the probability of the current year ending with a surplus of about £900,000 above the estimates. The Times anticipates that according to present appearances there will be a surplus of £1,750,000 for the fiscal year 1906-1907.

CHINESE ON THE RAND.

Mr. Winston Churchill, Under Secretary for the Colonies, answering a question in the House of Commons, explained that the abrogation of the Chinese convention dealing with coolie labour would require the assent of China, as it would affect emigration to the Straits Settlements and Burmah, which were included in the Convention. So far as the Transvaal was concerned the Convention could be rendered a dead-letter by the Consuls resuming the powers delegated to the emigration agents.

THE ALGECIRAS CONFERENCE.

The sittings of the conference at Algeciras have been suspended and a rupture of negotiations is imminent. It is expected that the various Governments will now negotiate directly.

Mr. Chamberlain has uttered a warning to the Government against their entering upon the dangerous policy of interfering with the vital interests of self-governing colonies.

BRITISH POLITICS AND CHINESE LABOUR.

London, March 16.
Mr. Winston Churchill, Under Secretary for the Colonies, demonstrated the Government's intention to put an end to the exportation of Chinese to the Transvaal as soon as the out-standing licences have all been used up. First, British Consuls in China would be instructed to cease their co-operation in the business; secondly, the Government would veto any proposals that might be submitted by the Transvaal (when it obtained responsible self-government) if the proposals were considered by the Imperial Government derogatory to the fundamental principles of liberty and decency. He urged that the mine-owners should "cease wringing their hands," and turn their energy to discover some "less unnatural" substitute for Chinese labour.

Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain concurred with each other in warning the Government against entering on a dangerous policy of interfering with the vital affairs of a self-governing colony.

THE BRITISH ARMY.

London, March 17.
Major Seeley's motion to reduce the British Army by ten thousand men was rejected in the House of Commons by a vote of 296 to 56.

The estimates for 1906-7 are set at £29,976,000, this being a decrease of £17,000 on the last Estimates, despite the fact that an additional £220,000 has been put apart for reserves. It is expected that the reservists will reach a total of £122,000. For stores and clothing the amount to be laid out is £290,000.)

THE FUTURE USE OF CAVALRY.

Talking of the arm of cavalry and shock tactics reminds the military correspondent of the Globe that there is an article in the current number of the Revue des Deux Mondes by a French officer, General Negrier, on the lessons of the late war. It is interesting, but not convincing, he says, and it cannot help accentuating the difference of opinion which already exists as to the rôle of cavalry in modern war. Who shall decide when doctors disagree? "One cannot help sympathising—says the writer—with the British cavalry officer in his desire to take to heart and profit by the lessons of the war when his tutors are at cross purposes. I think I am right in saying that Sir Ian Hamilton, in his book, holds the view that neither the Russian nor Japanese cavalry did anything; but that if they had been trained to act as good solid infantry they might, when dismounted, have done good work on either the Russian or Japanese side. This is the view held by the French General Negrier in his article. Like Ian Hamilton, he holds the view that cavalry, as cavalry, are no longer of much value in modern war. The Russians, of course, endorsed that opinion in a general way, by arming their cavalry with the rifle and bayonet and teaching them to fight on foot. The advantages which ought to have accrued to them in consequence are explained away by saying that they were not taught to shoot straight. This may be true to some extent, because the Russian soldier is universally admitted to be the worst shot in any Army in Europe; he gets but few rounds for practice, and these are fired mostly in volleys, which are the negation of accuracy. After reading Ian Hamilton's book, and General Negrier's article, one ought to be persuaded to the view that cavalry as such are obsolete, and that their great use in modern war is as a sort of glorified species of mounted infantry only. But the able letter of the special correspondent of The Times in August last puts another complexion on the matter. He was well qualified to form a sound opinion, and held the view that the need for cavalry on both sides during the war was very great. The Russian cavalry, trained only to fight on foot, threw away their most valuable weapon, mobility; while on the other hand even the microscopic force of Japanese cavalry, indifferently mounted, was able to hold the Russians throughout the campaign. At Mukden well handled, hard riding cavalry, lancers or swordsmen, might have ridden over the Japanese infantry time after time, and the battle might have proved a drawn one. The Japanese, at all events, thoroughly believe that genuine cavalry, and plenty of them, are essential to an army. I am glad to notice the same spirit in our new cavalry journal. British cavalry officers attach full importance to the rifle and to fighting on foot, but they believe that the need for cavalry armed and trained in orthodox cavalry fashion, and handled in a manner consistent with cavalry tradition, has not diminished. This is in quite a contrary spirit to the French General Negrier, who demands the complete reorganisation of the French cavalry. He urges that tradition, the pride of the horse soldier, his smartness and dash, must all give way, and be replaced by men taught to ride merely for purposes of more rapid movement from one place to another."

LIFE IN MOROCCO.

The Babel-al-Maghreb, or Land of the Setting Sun, has ever possessed great fascination for the more adventurous of artists. Writing in the English Illustrated Magazine on this subject, Mr. Frank Scudamore says the light, the glowing colour, the infinite varieties of type and costume, and the kaleidoscopic conditions that would seem to govern daily existence have in themselves an irresistible charm to which the spice of very real danger, inseparable from travel in the land of the Sheriffs, adds a captivating flavour.

It is a runner who carries your mails in Morocco, a humble creature whose sole earthly possessions are a loin-cloth and a length of dry rope, part of which latter he ties every night to his great toe when fatigue compels him to snatch a few hours' sleep, and sets fire to the other end of it so that he may be awakened when the burning yarn reaches his foot. These carriers cover hundreds of miles of country in an incredibly brief space of time; they swim rivers, they cross almost impassable mountain passes to gain a few hours by a short cut, they battle often with choking dust-storms or not less choking swarms of locusts, which they may meet on their way, enduring every hardship of cold and thirst and fatigue, and all to gain a wage at which the most destitute of unemployed in this country would snort a contemptuous refusal.

In truth, Morocco is a strange land in every aspect of the life of its people; a country of vast potentialities from an agricultural point of view, whose rolling plains might, in given conditions, easily be converted in a granary for Europe. Yet so long as it remains under the pretended government of its native rulers it can never be other than a hot-bed of inter-tribal strife, of recurrent rebellions against the so-called chief authority, and the happy home of every form of brigandage, pillage, and rapine. It is not too much to say that every Moorish village, is at war with its neighbours on either side, the most pregnant cause of strife being the abduction by one or the other of the reigning local beauties. Nor is any more of peace to be found under the black goat skin tents of the nomad Kabyles.

The Sultan himself is in supreme authority just where he happens to be, and to the extent of his reaching power of his armed fist. He is, perforce, his own tax collector, and ranges the country surrounded by a ragged army of some 2,500 to 3,000 men.

The stay of the Sultan and his army in any given place is determined by the amount of unjust to be extorted from the district, and by the powers of resistance of the district to that extortion. And during that sojourn many are the horrors that are perpetrated. The flogging, the hacking off hands or feet, and the tossings—to fall head downwards—by the Sultan's skilled executioners of those unfortunates who fail to satisfy His Majesty's demands. At length, however, the district being sufficiently bled, the order is given for departure, and some day at dawn the great horde of robbers, laden and fattened with loot, streams out again over the plain to fresh pastures. The Sultan has passed, the Lord has gone, and has left behind him villages impoverished, many subjects without hands, or feet, or eyes, and not a few widows and orphans, and above everything all hearts aching with agonised sense of injustice, and burning with fierce, but impotent lust of revenge.

HABUTAYE AT YOKOHAMA.

Enquiries from America continued throughout the week and a good business was done. Owing to continued increase of stocks, however, prices showed a downward tendency, though generally speaking, there has been no considerable change since last week.

Telegrams from Kanazawa say that prices have gone down and that there was enquiry for inferior qualities.

RICE.

Tokyo.—Speculative purchasing set in through the well-known broker, Matsutani, upon which extraordinary fluctuations followed. At one time, the maximum price went up to yen 16, though the standard price had on an average remained at yen 14.31 for some weeks. Naturally the market was thrown into an agitated state. Apprehensions as to a sudden fall caused great anxiety as to margin-money deposited by purchasers and the possibility of the directors of the Exchange calling for additional and extraordinary margin-money in accordance with the bye-laws.

Osaka and Kobe.—In sympathy with the rise in Tokyo, the price went up remarkably but the rise was regarded as merely temporary.

Cotton Spinning Companies—The shares of these companies were very brisk, going up by yen 3 all round.

GENERAL TERAUCHI'S SPEECH AND PRESS COMMENTS THEREON.

Great importance was naturally attached to the utterances of the Minister of War on what has been termed "the military necessity" for the purchase of private railways by the Government. The stenographic report of the speech was given fully in the Tokyo dailies a few days after its delivery. As an important part of the warm controversy that is still going on over the State purchase of the railways we reproduce the speech in an epitomised form, together with some of the press comments that it elicited. Japan, said the General, is a country that has an enormously extensive coast line. She must be prepared for the contingency of the landing of a hostile army at some place far removed from the ordinary lines of communication in these islands. Did such a landing take place, say on the coast of Echigo, for instance, prompt action on the part of the military alone could save the situation. The trouble in this country in connection with railways is that they are owned by a number of private companies who are trying to run them with insufficient capital. The consequence is that none of the lines are provided with sufficient carriages, trucks and engines to allow of the quick transport of a large number of troops and war material to a given spot. During the late war the Government was obliged to spend large sums of money in supplying the various deficiencies of the railways. Stations had to be enlarged, extra lines laid down, new rolling-stock purchased, and what not. In ordinary times these private lines manage to get along with a small supply of rolling-stock. The Government could not well force the Companies which own the lines to keep themselves in constant preparation for the transport of troops and war material. Then, nobody but those military men who have superintended transport business, has any conception of the delay caused by having to negotiate with a whole member of small Companies in order to get troops rapidly despatched to a certain spot. Where the fate of a country may depend on rapid mobilization, as is the case with Germany to-day and as may be the case with Japan in the future, no military experts would venture to rely on private railways. That our Japanese railways to-day are quite inadequate for employment in a great military emergency nobody who has had practical experience in forwarding troops and war material doubts. For the Government to have to lay out large sums of money to supply the defects of private railways every time these railways are called upon to do military service is bad economy. Rather than do this it is infinitely better that the Government should purchase the lines, put them in thorough repair and keep them supplied with sufficient rolling-stock to allow of big military operations being carried on at a few days' notice. In time of peace they will yield a revenue to the Government and in time of war they will go far to render the country safe from all attacks.

The Jiji Shimpō in commenting on the speech, says that were all the lines kept up to the standard of the Sanyo Tetsudō the Military would have no complaint to make even in time of war. This railway is far and away the best line in Japan. The Jiji thinks that the Government could meet the demands of the Military by the enforcement of stringent regulations bearing on the carrying efficiency of railways. But the reply to this is that where the capital of a company is quite insufficient, large purchases of rolling-stock and improvements of the lines are impossible. It would come to this, the Government would have to finance the lines in time of peace, in order to be able to use them in time of war. For this they have no funds available, but even could they provide the money to carry it out, such a policy would be open to many objections.

The Japanese press was almost unanimous in condemning the line taken by the Minister of War. Certain writers express great surprise that a military man in Japan should to-day adopt an alarmist tone in speaking of the dangers of foreign invasion. What is the use of our Navy, it is asked, if troops can be landed on our shores at any spot an enemy may choose? But what country is there that can send troops against us? asks the Nichi Nichi Shimbun. The notion that any great Western Power would ever venture on invading Japan after the object lesson she has given the world in her conflict with Russia is too absurd to be entertained by sober-minded men. Countries must provide against all probable contingencies, but certain contingencies are so wildly improbable that they are not worth a moment's consideration. To exist in an enemy's country an army must not only land, but it must put on shore a vast quantity of food and ammunition. All this cannot be done in a few hours. In these times of rapid communication the approach of a formidable enemy to our shores would be published far and wide long before he was near enough to strike a blow. We have no reason to fear either the Koreans or the Chinese, and who is there else to fear, asks one of our contemporaries. In the conception of the Jiji Shimpō, the Asahi Shimbun and the Nichi Nichi Shimbun the reasons given by the Minister of War for the purchase of the railways are not only unconvincing, they imply a certain want of confidence in the all-sufficiency of Japan's armaments to protect her from foreign invasion. The Nichi Nichi says that even if the railways are purchased by the State they will be principally controlled by the Minister of Communications and be used primarily for commercial purposes. The theory that the principal object of building railways is to provide means for the transport of troops and war material may be dismissed as untenable, says our contemporary. The proposal to purchase the railways comes from the desire of the Government to find a new source of revenue. It is anticipated they can be turned into valuable State property. The strategic necessity plea will not stand investigation, say the Opposition journals. The unanimity of the Japanese press against the purchase of the railways is certainly very remarkable. On many other Government measures opinion is divided, but the great Dailies, with the exception of the Kokumin Shimbun, and all the chief magazines are opposed to the nationalization of the railways—for three main reasons. (1) It is said that there is no guarantee that the railways will be worked successfully by the Government, it having hitherto shown no great proficiency in this line. (2) The present is considered to be a very unsuitable time to try a doubtful experiment of the kind proposed. It will certainly derange Japan's finances to a considerable extent, whatever be the plans adopted for issuing loans. (3) It is apparent that the State purchase of private railways is part of the monopolizing policy to which the present Government has committed itself. To this policy the Japanese press to-day is strenuously opposed. It regards it as a serious menace to both commerce and industry in this country for reasons which need not be set down in detail here, but which will certainly commend themselves to foreign business men in this settlement.

CHINA.

Saturday, March 24.

Mr. Ching Kiapen, Vice-Minister for Justice, and Mr. Wu Tingfang, Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, are engaged in drafting a law prohibiting too early marriages, which prevail among wealthy people in China, their aim being to prevent the production of constitutionally weak persons.

Chinese and French merchants have combined to start a banking concern, under the appellation of the Franco-Chinese Bank, with a capital of four million taels. They intend to provide branches at Shanghai and Peking, and have applied to the Peking Government for permission.

Prince Kalachin, of Mongolia, representing all the Mongolian Princes, has asked Viceroy Tung Chao-yi, one of the Chinese Commissioners in the Russo-Chinese negotiations, to confer with him on all affairs concerning Inner or Outer Mongolia whenever these may be referred to at the conference. Otherwise, the Mongolian Princes will not recognise a convention arbitrarily concluded.

The officers of the German army in North China were received on March 22nd by the Empress Dowager and the Emperor in audience. The German guards will withdraw at the beginning of April.

A Shanghai telegram says that negotiations between Chinese delegates and the Foreign Representatives as to the recent outrage at Nanchang were opened on March 21st.

On the night of March 20th, Nanchang was visited by a severe hail-storm. Some of the hail was as large as eggs (?) Many houses were damaged and cultivated fields were desolated.

According to Peking telegrams received by Tokyo papers, M. Pokotloff recently paid a visit to the Waiwupu and is reported to have said that Great Britain is engaged in a serious intrigue. She is instigating foreign countries to enter upon disputes, intending to secure her own interests while the Powers are so engaged. The Russian Minister further said that British officers in Kashgar had asked the local government for a concession of land, and that the British army had been guilty of arbitrary conduct in Tibet with the view of making that country a second India. In conclusion, he went so far as to say that China must be watchful of Great Britain's actions on the Asiatic stage, and that Russia, jointly with Germany, is attentive to the British attitude. There is no information as to what reply was given by the Chinese officials of the Foreign Department and Viceroys Ku-Kongwi and Na-tung to this statement.

The proposed reception of the wives and daughters of the foreign representatives by the Empress Dowager, fixed to take place on March 22nd, has been postponed owing to inclement weather.

Viceroy Yuan Shi-kai, of Tientsin, has ordered from Germany arms to the value of a million taels. These will be issued to the Seventh Division, the organization of which was recently completed. It is added that this official purchased last year from Germany arms to the amount in cost of 2,223,700 taels.

The Russian delegate at the Russo-Chinese

Conference has, it is said, consented to pay to the Chinese Government the duty which the Russians collected at Yingkow while they occupied that port. This was the subject of one of the demands by China during the negotiations.

Monday, March 26.

The Peking Government has now replied to the request of various provincial Governors that several stated places should be opened to foreign trade. The Government, it appears, is apprehensive of the recurrence of disturbances such as the Nanchang affair and has therefore given instructions to the provincial officials that places in the interior can not be opened for the transaction of foreign business unless the popular conditions of the locality are well investigated beforehand.

In connexion with the delay of the Russo-Chinese negotiations on account of the illness of M. Pokotiloff, a Peking telegram says that under the pretext of indisposition, the Russian envoy is really awaiting evidence from the Manchurian armies which is to be submitted to the conference, and for which officers who were in Manchuria before and after the outbreak of the war have been called upon.

A curious report comes from Manchuria via Peking to the effect that a large quantity of Japanese merchandise destined for Siberian districts is lying at various points along the railway in the vicinity of Changtu. The reason given is that the Russians have prohibited the transportation of Japanese-owned goods by railway north of Changchung. As a matter of fact, however, there is no Japanese merchandise and there are practically no passengers using the line north of Changtu or indeed north of Mukden. So at least we gather from recent telegrams. It is of course quite possible that alleged Japanese merchandise may have been offered by Chinese who disguised it for transportation in order to escape the squeezes of the local Chinese officials. The prohibition by the Russians of the passage of Japanese goods and passengers has been reported frequently from Japanese sources in Manchuria.

Certain princes of Outer Mongolia intend, it is said, to proceed to Japan for purposes of study, but M. Pokotiloff has lodged an objection with the Peking Government calling upon it to stop their departure. Prince Ching and Viceroy Lieu are also endeavouring to throw obstacles in the way of the princes and their proposed visit.

The Tokyo Asahi's Peking correspondent reports that Russia and China have agreed to make mutual concessions with regard to the question of forestry and mining rights in Kirin and Amur Provinces, and to conclude a special agreement based on a secret Convention which is believed to exist.

Viceroy Yuan Shih-kai is reported to have sent in a representation to the Commercial Department at Peking, urging the authorities to open negotiations with Japan forthwith for the construction of the Hsinmintun-Mukden Railway. It is said that the Viceroy has had the route surveyed by engineers.

The statement of accounts for 1905 of the Yangtze Wharf and Godown Co., Ltd., whose paid-up capital is Tls. 250,000, shows a divisible balance of Tls. 75,998. It is proposed to pay a dividend of 18 per cent; to write off the whole of preliminary charges, Tls. 12,800; to pass Tls. 12,500 to reserve increasing this fund to Tls. 30,000; and to carry forward the balance, Tls. 5,668.

The report for 1905 of the National Bank of China, whose paid-up capital is $2,427,180, shows a divisible balance of $186,920. It is proposed to write $10,000 off furniture, place $12,731 to capital reserve and $90,089 to reserve, and carry forward the balance, $74,100.

The cooerage and sawmill of the Green Island Cement Works, Hunghom, were burnt down on the 11th. The damage done was estimated at $36,000, which was insured.

Two of the ringleaders in the Changpu riot have been captured and executed; the value of the English mission property destroyed has been estimated at $100,000.

The statement of accounts for 1905 of the Shanghai and Hongkew Wharf Co., Ltd., whose paid-up capital is Tls. 3,200,000, shows divisible balance after payment of an interim dividend of 6 per cent, of Tls. 413,065. It is proposed to pay a final dividend of 8 per cent., making 14 per cent. for the year, to place Tls. 100,000 to repairs account, and carry forward the balance, Tls. 57,065.

The report for 1905 of the China Sugar Refining Co., Ltd., whose paid-up capital is $2,000,000, shows a divisible balance of $1,205,470, after payment of an interim dividend of 10 per cent. It is proposed to pay a final dividend of 15 per cent., making 25 per cent. for the year, put $850,000 to reserve, pay a bonus of $15,000 to the European staff, and carry forward the balance.

Sir Ernest Satow has requested the Waiwupu to instruct Viceroy Tsên to abolish the likin office which, at Swatow, has been levying dues on foreign imports which have already paid Customs duty; the Waiwupu has telegraphed to the Viceroy for a reply.

The North-China Daily News, among its Notes on Native Affairs, has the following:—

It is reported from Peking that H.I.M. Kuang Hsu has been lately suffering from a certain disease which is explained as follows:—His Majesty seems to hate the sound of men's voices, while he also dislikes light. He seems to prefer sitting in a darkened room, requiring the utmost silence from those about him. On the afternoon of the 3rd instant his Majesty was attacked with a sudden dizziness, from the effects of which he fell prone on the ground, remaining unconscious for quite half-an-hour. The Empress Dowager has naturally become quite alarmed at the state of his Majesty's health and at once telegraphed instructions to the Tartar-Generals, Viceroys and Governors throughout the Empire to make enquiries after any physicians within their several jurisdictions whom they may consider capable of healing the Emperor and relieving his Majesty of his malady.

A later message says the Emperor has quite recovered and is again attending to business.

The N.-C. Daily News translates the two following notes relating to the Nanchang affair from the columns of the Nanfengao:—

The Waiwupu has wired to the Governor of Kiangsi, directing him at once to arrest the man Liu who, it is now ascertained, took a leading hand in the assault on Magistrate Chiang.

Acting on telegraphic information received from the Governor of Kiangsi, which stated that, after a post-mortem examination the British Consul and the English doctor certified that the wounds of magistrate Chiang were not self-inflicted, the Waiwupu has addressed a note to all the Foreign Ministers at Peking, stating that the cause of the recent tragedy was really due to the missionary Lacruche, and that on this account, China, besides inflicting proper punishment on the culprits, will entertain no other demands of France's of whatever character. On receipt of this note, all the different Ministers blamed France in the matter.

A Hongkong telegram to the Asahi says that on the night of March 22nd, a number of pirates attacked a small steamer belonging to the Standard Oil Co., of Canton, and stole rifles and ammunition from the ship. An American gun-boat left Hongkong at once to search for the pirates.

Tuesday, March 27.

It is reported from Peking (Asahi) that high officials of various departments have presented memorials to the Throne with regard to the Nanchang affair. One of these asserts that recent troubles in reference to foreign religions are attributable to the negligence of the Home and Foreign Offices. The memorialist tells the Waiwupu that the authorities are too much in the habit of humiliating themselves before foreign protests whenever trouble is created between natives and foreigners, and says that as a result, the sovereign rights of China are always abused. In conclusion, he insists that strong steps should be taken in the Nanchang affair. A professor of the University declares that the conduct of the French priest was the origin of the Nanchang outrage and that China is in no sense responsible for the occurrence. France, therefore, must be held responsible for all that the native magistrate and the British missionary suffered. A secretary of the Imperial Court expresses a similar opinion, and adds that the Governor of Kiangsi should be punished for negligence, because of which the tumult took place. Under these circumstances, the attitude of the Waiwupu towards the Nanchang affair has become firmer than ever.

Wednesday, March 28.

The Chinese Minister in St. Petersburg wired to the Waiwupu on March 23rd that the Russian Government intends to constructing branch lines of the Siberian Railway, one stretching over the Amur province, another to Kiakta, and a further one from West Siberia to the foot of the Altai Mountains. The Chinese representative further said that as regards the Amur line, the Russian delegate seems to have informed the Chinese Government during the Russo-Chinese negotiations now being conducted in Peking of his Government's intentions and the Chinese Minister now asks that the concessions be not granted. The Kiakta line would cause grave trouble in the future in the districts between Kulon and Changkiakow. Consequently a strong protest should be presented to the Russian Government. By establishing a branch line between West Siberia and the Altai range the Russians aim to extend their influence over Heinkian and Ili.

Thursday, March 29.

The demands which France has presented to the Peking Government with regard to the Nanchang disturbance are reported to be as follows:—

- 1.—China to record her recognition of the fact that the magistrate of Nanchang was not murdered by the French priest.
- 2.—Six of the natives who took part in the murder of the French priests to be punished with death.
- 3.—The Chinese Government to pay sixty thousand taels to the family of the French priest who was murdered and ninety thousand taels for the damage caused to the Catholic Church by the mob.

A Manchurian telegram, via Peking, says that since the withdrawal of the Japanese Armies mounted banditti are raiding the country. The Chinese soldiers are quite unable to deal with the banditti.

Friday, March 30.

A Peking telegram to the Asahi says M. Pokotiloff has paid a visit to Prince Ching. The Russian Minister said it was understood that the Chinese Government contemplated stationing a large army at Harbin with the view of interrupting communication between Russia and Vladivostok. Probably the project originated in the instigation of a certain third Power. Reminding the Prince of the friendly relations that had existed for three hundred years past between the two countries, he said China should not yield to any such treacherous temptation. The Russian representative added that even if the Chinese Government intended of its own accord to carry out this measure, Russia could not consent to the enforcement of any decision inimical to her.

Leading native capitalists of the Amur and Kirin provinces have decided to send a representative to the Central Government to present a petition with regard to various enterprises in those territories. The principal purpose of the petition is to ask the authorities not to grant concessions for timber-felling, fishing, mining or railways to foreigners as the Chinese intend to carry out such works with their own capital.

On March 28th, the wives and daughters of the foreign representatives were entertained at the Palace by the Empress-Dowager.

The Governor of Mukden has wired to the Central Government to the effect that the Japanese military authorities have returned to the Chinese local Government all the official buildings, etc., which the former occupied during the war.

The Chinese Government intends to establish the office of Governor-General at Lhasa, Tibet, and will appoint Viceroy Wei Kwan-tao, Governor-General of Fukien and Chekiang, to the new post.

The Grand Council has been authorised by the Throne to authorise the Viceroy of Szechuan to coin at his mint imitation rupees for circulation in Tibet.

The Tartar-General at Heilungkiang recently wired to the Peking Government that on the 11th and 12th inst. over 40,000 Russian troops arrived at Tsitsihar and Ussuri, and he was in great fear of their creating disturbances. Representations were made to the Russian military officers and over 10,000 of the troops were taken to Vladivostok.

The Chinese Government having undertaken to pay the indemnity to Great Britain for the Tibet expedition, the entire Lamaist hierarchy, on receipt of the information, prostrated themselves toward the north in token of their gratitude. They have also presented two pieces of hata and two gold Buddhas as offerings to their Imperial Majesties.

There are no people, remarks the N.-C. Daily News, that can beat the Chinese in the practice when necessary of what is proverbially known as "whipping the devil round the stump." Our Kashing correspondent writes that the oil-shops there are prohibited by the boycott from buying American kerosene oil, but their customers refuse to burn substitutes on any pretence. The consequence is that the oil shops do not buy, but "borrow" American kerosene oil in Shanghai, and thus calm their consciences and placate their patrons.

The Nanfangpao says that in the settlement for the Nanchang massacres the Waiwupu will pursue separate policies in relation to Great Britain and France, "as the former have a perfectly just case on their side, while the latter have by no means a clear case."

It is stated in reliable quarters in Peking that instructions are to be soon sent to the Viceroys and Governors of provinces to put into effect the scheme of Viceroy Yuan Shih-k'ai to put a stop to the opium-smoking habit amongst the official and literate classes. If, after the expiration of an ample limit of time to all to get rid of the noxious habit, there be found anyone still addicted to the use of the drug the culprit is to be severely denounced and punished. The age limit, N.-C. Daily News understands, is forty years. All under that age will be bound to get rid of the habit; those above are given the option to continue or stop as they please. Such men, are however, to be registered, and are granted certificates which, upon the death of the holders, must be returned to the yamen for cancellation. As this class of men die away there will naturally be no more opium-smokers in the country. When promulgating these instructions to the masses they are to be told about the flourishing condition of the men and youths of Japan as compared with the effete and emaciated state of the great portion of the people of this Empire who are opium smokers, and an effort is made to inflame the patriotism and sense of shame of the people.

A Peking correspondent tells our senior Shanghai contemporary that there is some talk in high official circles in the capital to ask for some special recognition by the Throne of the work done by His Excellency Sir Chengtung Liang Ch'eng, K.C.M.G., Chinese Minister at Washington, during his three years' term of office abroad, which is about to expire very soon. His Excellency's official rank is that of Expectant Metropolitan Official of the Fourth grade—equal to that of a Sub-Director of the Minor Courts, such as that of the Court of Sacrificial Worship, the Imperial Stud, Banqueting Court, and the like. These posts are considered beneath the merit of a man like Sir Chengtung, who has done a good deal for his country in the diplomatic service, and, we understand, it is proposed to recommend to their Majesties that the returning Chinese Minister to the U. S., Spain, and Peru be promoted without delay to the post of Sub-Chancellor of the Grand Secretariat (a Metropolitan post of the 2nd grade, class B) with the additional distinction of the brevet rank of the Vice-President of the Board of Rites (which is a post of the 2nd grade, class A).

The report of the Shanghai Cricket Club for last year shows that after paying off debentures for £1s. 1,000, spending $851 on the Pavilion, and remitting $823 for gear, the Club has a credit balance of $2,587, and a stock of gear valued at $750. There are 400 playing members, of whom 84 are absent, and 266 non-playing, of whom 68 are absent.

THE RAILWAY NATIONALIZATION BILL.

The special committee which examined the Railway Nationalization Bill met on March 25th. Count Tokugawa, Viscount Tani and four other members delivered lengthy speeches opposing the bill, after which Mr. Yamagata, Minister for Home Affairs, and Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, duly replied. Count Ogimachi introduced an amendment to the Government's scheme, and to properly investigate this amendment the committee elected a sub-committee consisting of seven.

On the evening of March 24th, the members of the Upper House belonging to the Kenkyukai, Mokuyokai, Doyo-kai, Chawa-kai and unaffiliated sections held a meeting to express their views. The majority decided to introduce an amendment to the bill but the Doyo-kai declined to vote with them as it is opposed to the Government's proposal. The proposed amendment was as follows:—

- 1.—The time during which the Government proposes in Art. 2 to purchase private railways should be extended to ten years.
- 2.—The thirty-two private railways to be purchased by the Government should be reduced to seventeen, the other fifteen being abandoned.
- 3.—An addition, "appeal shall be filed," should be made to Art. 9, which provides that whenever there is a protest with regard to the transfer of any railway, an examining committee shall be appointed and their decision shall be regarded as final.
- 4.—The grace of time for payment—which is provided under Art. 12 to be by means of Government bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest, within two years after the contract of purchase is settled—should be extended to five years.
- 5.—An addition, "this law has no connection with the Private Railway Construction Law" should be made to the bill.

The private railways which are marked for abandonment by the amendment are: Kawagoe, Jobu, Chuetsu, Omi, Kanan, Narita, Dzu-so, Toyokawa, Nankai, Chugoku, Tobu, Mito, Bisei, Koya, and Hakata. The House accepted the amendment and passed the Bill. On it being sent down to the Lower House Marquis Saionji accepted the amendment of the Peers and after a very disorderly scene the Bill finally passed through all its stages and was declared duly carried.

The Nichi Nichi publishes comparisons between Government and private railways, the figures being calculated on the average at the end of 1904.

In the matter of construction expenses, the total for Government railways was yen 104,075 per mile, while that of private railways—the thirty-two private railways to be nationalized—was yen 75,861. These figures show a difference of 27 per cent. For business expenditures the Government railways required yen 6,847 per mile; and the private railways yen 4,920. The ratio of the former per yen 100 of income was yen 44.20 and of the latter, yen 41.30. The rate for passengers on the Government railways was yen 1.44 per person per mile, and on private railways yen 1.34; freight on the former was yen 1.96 per ton per mile; and on the latter yen 1.75.

As to the number of persons employed and their wages, employees on the Government railways numbered 17.7 per mile; and on the private lines, 12.6. The average wage on the former was yen 15.50 per month per mile; and on the latter, yen 13.30. The Nichi Nichi adds that various taxes on the private railways are included in the business expenditure.

MR. JACOB SCHIFF.

Mr. Jacob Schiff arrived in Japan on Sunday and left Yokohama for Tokyo by the 11 a.m. train on March 27th. He paid a visit to Marquis Saionji, Premier, and to Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance. The same evening, he was entertained at the American Legation. On March 28th, Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, gave a dinner party, at his official residence in honour of the distinguished American banker. On this occasion all the Ministers of State, leading business men of Tokyo, and some American notables were present.

At 11.30 a.m. on March 28th, Mr. Jacob Schiff proceeded to the Imperial Palace in company with Mr. Huntington Wilson, American Charge d'Affaires, and was received by the Emperor. The two gentlemen were entertained by His Majesty at luncheon. Princes Fushimi and Yamashina, the Minister of the Imperial Household, the Minister of Finance, Barons Suyematsu and Kaneko, and Messrs. Matsuo and Takahashi, the well-known bankers, were present.

EXPENSES OF PRISONERS.

Recently the Russian Government presented to the Japanese Foreign Office a statement of expenses incurred in supporting the Japanese prisoners of war. The expenses paid by Japan for the keep of the Russian prisoners has been ascertained and the authorities intend to submit the account shortly to Russia. According to the Nichi Nichi, a balance of some eighty million yen is in favour of Japan.

ACCIDENT ON THE ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

At 10 a.m. on March 29th, a sad accident took place on the Yokohama Electric Railway at a point near No. 193, Yamashita-cho. An old woman named Taka Taguchi, while trying to cross the metals was run over by a car. She sustained severe injuries on the feet and head and was at once removed to the Jinzen Hospital, at Noge, where she died the same afternoon.

KOREA.

A report was received on March 22nd in Seoul to the effect that some forty Japanese attacked the Korean Government office at Hong-ju and assaulted the officials. Five police constables were sent at once to the scene of the trouble. Details are wanting.

The Korean Ministers of State held a conference on March 21st at the Residency-General. Marquis Ito submitted to them his views that their first business was to improve domestic administrative affairs. The proposals of the Resident General were (1) to at once begin the reform of the local administrative organization; and (2) to employ the loan obtained from the Japan Industrial Bank on education and in industry encouragement enterprises. The Korean Ministers assented and submitted the proposal to the Emperor. His Majesty at once gave his sanction.

The Chiyoda, Tatsuta and a number of destroyers arrived at Chemulpo on March 22nd. The commanders of the warships proceeded to Seoul the following day.

A report from Wonsan says that on March 17th, about five hundred Korean fishermen armed with clubs and large sticks attacked the office of the Korean Sea Products Association there, causing serious damage to the building and severely injuring three Koreans. The outrage is believed to be due to the notion on the part of the fishermen that the association would deprive them of their livelihood. The directors of the company are negotiating with a Japanese fishing company with a view to the amalgamation of the two businesses.

A Seoul telegram says that some five hundred kin of powder has been stolen from the Korean military magazine.

On March 22nd, a Korean was arrested by a Japanese police-inspector on suspicion of having participated in the attempt to assassinate General Li Keun-thaik, Minister for War. According to the accused's statement, says the Jiji's Seoul correspondent, the two men who committed the assault at first fled to the interior but on their return to the Korean capital they were identified.

General Li Keun-thaik will leave for Tokyo in company with General Hasegawa, Commander of the garrison in Korea, to be present at the Grand Military Review which takes place on April 30th on the Aoyama Parade Ground.

The Korean Ministers of State held a meeting at the Residency-General on March 24th to discuss a proposal by Mr. Maruyama, Japanese adviser on Korean police affairs. The result does not appear to be definitely known but it is asserted that the proposal, whatever its nature, was adopted. The Jiji's Seoul correspondent says it is intended that Korean police administrative affairs shall be reformed and developed in accordance with the views of Marquis Ito, to which the Emperor of Korea has already given his sanction. In the sequel of the present meeting it is believed that many Japanese police will be added to the present Korean force.

There are some details of the recent riot at Nan-Pyong. A Seoul telegram says that a Korean employed by a Japanese merchant was arrested by the native police and removed to the District Office on some frivolous charge or other—drunkenness and disorderliness it is averred. Twenty-two Japanese proceeded to the Korean office, and asked the officials to release him. Some thirty-seven natives were present at this time and these at length attacked the office and rescued the prisoner. A few Japanese police appeared at once and arrested five Koreans and eight Japanese.

On the evening of March 24th, Marquis Ito entertained the foreign Consuls and their wives at his official residence.

A high Korean official in the Palace was sent to prison on March 25th, the cause of his punishment, according to the Jiji's Seoul correspondent, being that under the instructions of Lady Om—the highest feminine influence in the Palace—he prevented the transmission of a telegraphic message from the Emperor to Prince Yeu-wo who is now in Japan, a political refugee. The message was an Imperial pardon granted on the advice of Marquis Ito.

At 4 p.m. on March 25th, about seventy mounted bandits raided the district of Mampo in North Korea. Three Japanese soldiers were despatched to deal with them, but in the fighting that ensued one of the Japanese was wounded and fell into the hands of the outlaws, his two comrades being compelled to retire before overwhelming numbers.

The Residency-General at Seoul was officially opened on Wednesday. Speeches were made by the Resident-General and the Premier. The Premier proposed Banzai for the Emperor of Japan and the Resident-General for the Emperor of Korea. The place was abundantly decorated; a band was in attendance and played the national anthems and a variety of selections.

In connexion with the official opening of the Residency-General on March 28th, the following details are given by a Seoul correspondent. The ceremonies were carried out in a splendid fashion. Marquis Ito, Resident-General (whose rank corresponds with Field-Marshal or Admiral of the Fleet), was present at noon in company with General Hasegawa; Mr. Tsuruhara, Director of the Board of General Affairs, and other officials of the Residency-General; the Korean Ministers of State; Lieut.-Generals Haraguchi and Okihara, Admiral Inouye, one of the Aides-de-camp to the Emperor; Rear-Admiral Nakao, Commander of the squadron in Korean waters; the foreign representatives; and other Japanese and Korean notables. Marquis Ito spoke briefly, announcing the official opening of his office. Mr. Pak Che-son, Korean Premier, and other Korean officials made short speeches of congratulation upon the occasion. Subsequently all the distinguished guests proceeded to the Ho-tai garden where various entertainments were provided. The guests, numbering over two thousand, partook of luncheon. Marquis Ito made a speech thanking all for their presence and then went on to say that his mission to Korea under the instructions of the Emperor of Japan was to achieve a more perfect development of the Korean Empire. The Resident-General asked the Koreans and foreign representatives for their assistance in accomplishing this mission. The party was then entertained with various theatrical performances, musical amusements, etc.

The Emperor of Korea has decorated with the Second class of the Tai-keuk, Surgeon-Colonel Wada, who attended General Li Keun-thaik, Korean Minister for War, while the latter was undergoing treatment at the Seoul Hospital on account of injuries inflicted by would-be assassins.

A curious telegram from Seoul is published by the Nichi Nichi to the effect that after the arrival of Mr. Li Yongyok (a pro-Russian and former member of the Cabinet) in Shanghai, communications frequently took place between him and the Korean Palace through a German woman in the Korean capital. An Imperial messenger was twice sent to him. Further Mr. Ming Yongcho has left Seoul for Shanghai on a suspicious mission, and several mysterious rumours are afloat concerning him. It may be remembered that Mr. Li Yongyok left Seoul before the conclusion of the Japan-Korean convention.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

A Moji telegram dated March 25th says that the transports Ryoto Maru and Benten Maru have collided in the straits, both sustaining slight damage. The Ryoto was on her way from Dairen to Ujina and the Benten from Tokuyama to Saseho.

The Jiji has a telegram to the effect that at 3 a.m. on March 27th fire broke out on board the British sailing vessel Daylight, which has arrived at Yokkaichi with kerosene oil from New York for the Standard Oil Company.

A fishing junk having a crew of ten, struck a floating mine off the coast of Oshimamura, Fukui Prefecture, on Monday. The vessel was blown up and seven of the crew are missing, three being injured.

A telegram from Ujina says that at 2 a.m. on March 21st, the steamer Wakasa Maru went ashore off Nakanoma. The cruiser Takasago and the steamer Kamakura Maru proceeded the following evening to the scene to assist her. It is said that the crew of twenty-one, two horses, and 133 packages of postal matter were all safely landed.

A telegram from Wonsan, Korea, reports that fire broke out at 9 p.m. on March 23rd on board the steamer Keijo Maru belonging to the Hori Shokwai, Chemulpo, causing much damage to the hull. The cargo was landed before the accident and fortunately there was no injury to the crew.

The Japanese sailing vessel Daifuku Maru (456 koku), collided with a foreign sailing vessel at 2.30 p.m. on March 25th off Wakufari, the former being on her way from Wakamatsu, Chikuzen, to Osaka with a cargo of coal. The Japanese junk at once sank. The crew were all saved by the foreign ship.

The Hongkong Daily Press of March 23rd gives the following account of the collision which befel the Norwegian steamer Brand and the Japanese steamer Daini Kotohira Maru on March 20th. It appears that the collision occurred off Pedro Blanco, an island some 60 miles from Hongkong. Both vessels were bound for the colony, the Kotohira Maru from Karatsu and the Brand from Shanghai. A thick fog prevailed when the vessels collided. The Japanese steamer was struck on the starboard side of No. 5 hold, which soon filled with water, while the bow of the Brand is said to be considerably damaged. In a cabin above the No. 5 hold of the Kotohira Maru three men were asleep when the vessels struck. As a result of the collision one was killed and the other two injured. Apparently the two vessels were only a little distance apart exchanging signals in the fog, and the Japanese ship desiring to get near the shore changed her course with the result that the collision occurred. The Kotohira Maru arrived safely in the harbour, but had to be beached at Wanchai.

The German steamer Decima, 794 tons net, struck a rock near Cape Kami, in Hainan Strait, and will probably be a total loss.

The Armand Behic, with the incoming French mail, sustained some slight damage to her propeller while entering the port of Hongkong, and had to dock there.

The German steamer Florida, 2,237 tons net, is reported to have left Singapore on the 9th of November last for Vladivostok, and has not since been heard of.

THE RECENT FIGHTING IN THE PHILIPPINES.

From the Manila Cablenews we gather some particulars of the recent fighting among the Moros of Jolo which has caused so much comment in America. It appears that some six hundred of the most desperate element of the Moro outlaws, who were apparently impregnably intrenched on the top of an almost impassable mountain, were slain before they would lay down their arms. The dash and grit which characterized the advance of the American troops under every adverse circumstance, is said to be unequalled in the history of the archipelago. A telegram which was received by Colonel George Andrews, military secretary, from General Wood, reads as follows:—

Zamboanga, Mindanao, March 9.

Severe action between troops, Naval Detachment, Constabulary and hostile Moros at Mount Dajo, near Jolo. Opening on the afternoon of March 6th and lasting until morning of March 8th. Action involved the capture of Mount Dajo, a lava cone 2,100 feet high with crater at summit. The cone extremely steep and rugged. Last five hundred feet lying at an angle of from fifty to sixty degrees. The last fifty feet practically perpendicular, approachable only by lava ridges covered with heavy growth of timber strongly fortified. Fortifications generally invisible from a distance.

Army casualties fifteen enlisted killed, commissioned wounded four, enlisted wounded thirty-two.

Constabulary casualties, Captain John R. White, right thigh severe; three enlisted killed, thirteen enlisted wounded.

Names of nearest relatives and addresses will be sent as soon as company commanders are able to render detailed returns.

Action was incident to destruction of band of outlaws recognizing no chief who have been occupying the summit of Mount Dajo for the past eight months. The sultan and various dattos had made numerous unsuccessful efforts to get them out. Major Scott, Governor of Jolo, has worked unremittingly to this end. Since his departure especially they have been raiding friendly Moros and burning houses and buildings, including the target range buildings, at Jolo. Through their defiance of authority they were stirring up a dangerous condition of affairs.

The operations were under the direct charge of Colonel J. W. Duncan, 6th Infantry, who was placed in Jolo, and directed to take the place and capture and destroy the hostiles. He handled the situation well and is entitled to commendation.

The officers and men behaved splendidly, the position was naturally by far the most difficult we have ever had to take, and I believe the natural difficulties were as great as we have ever been called upon to overcome here or elsewhere. The defences were also very considerable and resistance was literally to the death.

All the defenders were killed, as near as could be counted from the dead about six hundred in number. Artillery had to be lifted by block and tackle some three hundred feet into position when a lodgment was made on the lip of the crater. It is impossible to conceive a naturally stronger position.

The Naval detachment rendered splendid services and is entitled to the highest commendation, as is the Constabulary, whose casualties were seventeen out of forty-four engaged.

I proceeded to Jolo accompanied by Brigadier General Tasker H. Bliss on the night of the sixth, and was present through the action from morning of the seventh until the conclusion of the operations on the eighth.

The attacking columns were commanded by Major O. Bundy, 6th Infantry, Captain E. P. Lawton, 19th Infantry, Captain T. E. Rivers, 4th Cavalry, until wounded, and after Captain L. M. Koehler, 4th Cavalry. Artillery, Captain F. F. McGlathlin, Signal Corps, Lieutenant Gordon Johnson, The District Chief of Constabulary, Col. W. S. Scott, was present and rendered excellent service in the general charge of the Constabulary Detachment.

Officers and men engaged in this expedition cannot be too highly commended for the magnificent manner in which they took this position. Total casualties all sources, eighteen killed fifty-two wounded. Subject to possible corrections.

THE RICE MARKET.

Speculative buying of rice by a syndicate of merchants has been going on steadily for the past week through Matsutani, the prominent broker. The purchases of the speculators are now reported to aggregate about three hundred and forty thousand koku. Naturally the price for future delivery has gone up by yen 1.50 to yen 1.60 which figures show a rise of yen 1.10 or yen 1.20 on those for March delivery. Apprehensions of a sudden fall in price are entertained in the market. In spite of the critical signs, however, say Tokyo papers, the directors of the Rice Exchange do not as yet take the necessary steps with a view to averting the expected crisis. The question of additional margin money is still left in abeyance. Meanwhile the speculators, who also seem to have read the indications correctly, are gradually unloading through small brokers. In case of a breakdown the small brokers are liable to bear any loss that may arise, but it is believed that they are secured by an understanding with the speculators. The alleged scheme is still in operation however. The margin money deposited by speculative buyers amounts to only yen 240,000 or yen 250,000 against nearly four hundred thousand koku purchased.

MR. GEORGE BARCLAY.

Mr. George Barclay left Tokyo by the 11.50 a.m. train on Friday for his new post as Secretary of Embassy at Constantinople. By this appointment His Britannic Majesty's Government pay a very marked tribute to Mr. Barclay's official reputation, for Constantinople is regarded in Downing street as the most important diplomatic position in Europe from an English point of view. But the regret felt in Tokyo and Yokohama for Mr. Barclay's departure is universal and profound. No British official has ever succeeded in endearing himself more thoroughly to all nationalities, or in combining with remarkable ability in the discharge of his duties all those qualities which most grace private life. We offer the heartiest wishes for Mr. Barclay's prosperity and happiness, and we express a most sincere hope that the promotion which he so fully merits may soon restore him to Tokyo in the post of Ambassador.

EARTHQUAKES IN FORMOSA.

Further investigations made by the Formosan Government as to the casualties arising from the recent earthquake show the following:—

	Males.	Females.	Total.
Killed .....	493	613	1,106
Severely injured.....	313	402	715
Slightly injured .....	500	641	1,141
	1,306	1,656	1,962

Houses collapsed, 3,831; damaged, 2,121.

A Taipei telegram says that a severe shock of earthquake occurred at 11 a.m. on March 26th in Toroku district, Formosa. The motion continued till the evening when the telegram was despatched. Many houses collapsed and a number of persons were killed or injured.

The Emperor and Empress have jointly presented ten thousand yen for distribution among the poorer people at Kagi, Toroku and other places in Formosa who are suffering from the effects of the destructive earthquake of March 17th.

SAGHALIEN.

According to a report brought by the Hirosaki Maru, which arrived at Nagasaki on March 28th from Vladivostock, the Russian authorities are making a map of Saghalien to demarcate the respective positions of Russia and Japan. Two Russian officials have already concluded investigations, going personally through North Saghalien. They will be appointed to the staff of the envoy when the negotiations are opened between the two countries. The Hochi adds that Russia intends to settle the question before the fishing season opens.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

As things now stand the Government has promised to make a thorough investigation of the special war taxes within two years, with a view to the discontinuance of certain imposts. A Bill was sent to the House of Peers by the Government some weeks ago providing for the appointment of a Special Committee to carry out the investigation. This Bill the Upper House rejected in a very determined manner, contending that it was one of the duties of the Department of Finance to examine into taxation of all sorts and report thereon and hence the House saw no reason for putting the country to the expense of paying a Special Committee to do this work. When we say they rejected the Bill we mean that they rejected the principal part of it, for it must be explained that the first clauses of the Bill simply stated that an investigation of the special war taxes with a view to their alteration in various respects should take place. Then came what to the Finance Department was the most important part of the Bill referring to the appointment of a Special Committee. This part was cut out by the House. On Saturday the Bill was presented to the Lower House in its mutilated state and the House was informed by Mr. Sakatani, the Minister of Finance, that since the Upper House refused to sanction the appointment of a Special Committee the necessary investigation would be done by his Department within the prescribed time. It is confidently asserted that the heavy income tax now collected will be one of the first taxes to be abolished two years hence.

The Tokyo electric railway companies, who had made application to the Tokyo Fucho for permission to raise the 3 sen fare to 5 sen each, withdrew the petition on March 23rd. The Chuo in an extra issued yesterday afternoon said that previous to the withdrawal, the chief of the Tokyo Metropolitan Police Office summoned the Presidents of the Tokyo Electric Railway Co., the Street Electric Railway Co., and the Tokyo Electric Tramway Co. and addressing them in the presence of Baron Senke, Governor of Tokyo-Fu, said that the reasons specified in the applications for permission to raise the fares could not be regarded as adequate and he advised the representatives of the railways to withdraw their petitions. This was accordingly done.

The Tokyo Marine Insurance Co. will hold a general meeting on April 2nd in order to submit to the shareholders a proposal to add yen 1,500,000 to the present capital, making a total of three million yen—each share of the face value of fifty yen. The company will present fifteen hundred shares to Mr. K. Kakumu, the manager of the Osaka and Kobe branches, and five hundred shares to the family of the late

Mr. Masuda, one of the directors, as rewards for their valuable services. Some years ago, according to the Chugai Shogyo, the company was in an embarrassed condition; the price of the fifty yen paid up shares went down to eighteen yen and the end of the concern seemed at hand. At this critical time, Mr. Kakumu, who was one of the junior employees, devoted himself to redeeming the company from its position and mainly through his efforts its present prosperity was attained. As a result, the price of the shares has risen from eighteen yen to seventy yen. Mr. Heisei co-operated with Mr. Kakumu while the latter was struggling to carry the company through its troubles.

The total subscription for the Sixth Exchequer Bonds—two hundred million yen—which closed on March 20th, aggregated yen 372,829,100 throughout the Empire.

The subscription is classified as follows:—

	Subscriptions over issue price. yen .	Subscriptions at issue price. yen .
Cash Subscriptions	8,268,400	325,198,700
Subscription by means of Government bonds	4,046,800	35,315,200
	12,315,200	360,513,900

Subscriptions by foreigners are reported to amount to about five million yen.

We reprinted from the columns of The Times the case brought in the Court of Arches against the Rev. R. C. Fillingham, the well-known Church of England clergyman, for disobeying the commands of the Bishop of St. Albans in that he ordained a Non-conformist minister—the Rev. A. C. White—at Emmanuel Church, Southend. The judgment of the Court, as pronounced by Sir Lewis Dibdin, Dean of Arches, was that the accused be deprived of his licence unless he express regret for his offence. The Dean, in giving judgment, remarked that the case was unprecedented in the Anglican Church.

Great interest was taken at Newcastle on Feb. 10th in the passage of the Japanese battleship Kashima, the largest warship built on the river, from Elswick Shipyard, above the bridges, to the graving dock. The chief difficulty lay in the great length of the vessel, which caused one portion to be under the high level bridge, while the other was under the swing bridge, giving the vessel a slant which reduced the clearance to a matter of inches. Elaborate precautions had been taken, and for weeks dredging had been going on in the narrow channel. Five tugs had the vessel in charge, and she passed successfully through the bridges on the flood tide.

The Engineer states in its "Dockyard Notes" that the new German battleships will be of 19,000 tons, or 200 tons larger than the newly launched British battleship Dreadnought, and will carry fourteen 12-in. guns, or four more than the British ship.

Mr. Theodore Wores, the well-known American painter, who visited Japan a number of years ago and exhibited the results of his work in Tokyo for the benefit of the Deaf and Blind School, has, since his return to California, produced a painting which is thus referred to in San Francisco papers:—

During his long stay in the Orient Wores was deeply impressed by the Dai Butsu at Kamakura, in Japan, and all it represented; and that "impression" he determined to paint when he could do himself and the subject justice. The picture, which was painted on through several years, seemed a very personal belonging to Wores, and he did not seek the exhibition that resulted in the sale. . . . With the exception of the background of characteristic country, the artist has placed the Great Buddha in imaginary surroundings, intending the composition to be symbolic of the Buddhist faith rising superior to error. The lotus flowers which fill the foreground are significant of human hopes and possibilities, deep-rooted in the shrine of superstition, yet capable of rising in spotless beauty to higher things. The mist over the lotus, which Wores has painted with beautiful transparency, signifies the mist of ignorance which seems in the picture to be forever rising, only to dissipate before the enlightened face of the Great Buddha, as placid and unchanging and as everlasting as the hills that surround it.

The "Light of Asia" has been sold for gold $5,000 to the Russells of Ocean Beach, where it will take its place among pictures of world-wide celebrity.

The launch of the cruiser Ikoma has been officially fixed to take place on April 9th at Kure. As on the occasion of the launch of her sister ship, the Tsukuba, the Crown Prince will be present at the ceremony.

The death is announced of M. Emile Boutmy, member of the Institute of France. With the exception of M. Taine and M. Jusserand, no Frenchman probably has ever made so profound a study of the Anglo-Saxon character and institutions as M. Boutmy. A translation of one of his most important works—"The English People: A Study of their Political Psychology"—was published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin a year or two ago. An introduction was contributed by Mr. J. E. C. Bodley, in which he pointed out a fact which would probably come as a strange surprise to most readers of the work, namely, that M. Boutmy suffered from blindness. M. Boutmy's blindness was not quite total. He could walk abroad unattended, and his eye perceived the verdure of trees and the brightness of stars at night. He could even faintly distinguish the features of a person at close quarters. But this was all. And Mr. J. E. C. Bodley justly observes that it is doubtful if there has ever been another case of a writer thus afflicted making a successful study of a foreign land.

Mr. T. Hanai and two other members of the Lower House have presented an enquiry to the Government regarding the lease of land at Surugadal, Tokyo, upon which the Greek Church is built. On March 25th, the Government replied stating that the land was leased in 1872 to the Russian Legation, and no limit was set as to time. Thinking that the lease should not be continued any longer under present conditions, the Government intends to conduct negotiations with the Russian Government at a favourable opportunity. It is not opportune at the present moment to give details.

The Russian Government has transmitted eight yen to the Japanese Foreign Office with the information that the money was found in a house in Harbin, where refugees from Vladivostok immediately after the outbreak of the war spent some time. Therefore, says the Russian Government, it must have belonged to one of those persons. The Foreign Office transferred the money to the Home Department for the purpose of having that office search for the person who lost it. Surely punctilious courtesy could go no farther.

The Siamese Government are reported to have the intention of employing five Japanese naval officers as instructors in the Royal Siamese Naval College. To this end the authorities are now in negotiation with Mr. Tanabe, the Japanese Chargé d'Affaires. It appears, according to the Asahi's Bangkok correspondent, that Siam, being apprehensive of protests from the leading Powers of Europe, has hitherto employed Swedish officers at the naval college. As her present naval resources are practically useless to meet emergencies that may arise, the Siamese Naval Department has decided to expand the present Navy. When Mr. Inagaki, Japanese Minister at Bangkok, left for home about the end of last year on official business, the Siamese Admiralty asked him for the loan of a number of Japanese officers as teachers. Mr. Inagaki, however, refused, apprehending objections from some third Power, but took with him eleven Siamese students to Japan for the purposes of naval study. It appears that the Chargé d'Affaires (there being no anticipation of objection from any other Power) has now acceded to the request of the Siamese authorities after consultation with his Government.

Admiral Sir Gerard Noel and his daughter arrived at Shimbashi from Hakone at 3.33 p.m. on March 26th. Admiral Saito, Minister for the Navy, Rear-Admiral Kato, Vice-Minister, and other distinguished persons received him on the platform. He at once proceeded to the British Embassy, accompanied by Commander Funakoshi, of the Naval Staff Office. The same evening, Sir Claude MacDonald, the British Ambassador, gave a dinner party in honour of the Admiral. Viscount Aoki and other Japanese and foreign guests were present.

The Imperial Salvage and Life Saving Society held a general meeting on the afternoon of March 25th, at the Hibiya Park, Tokyo. Some five thousand members from various provinces were present—the whole membership of the society is about sixteen thousand. A pavilion provided accommodation for the Ministers of State and the wearers of the medal of merit of the Society. Prince Arisugawa, the President, honoured the meeting with his presence. His Highness wore the uniform of an Admiral. The Prince arrived punctually and, after a short rest, gave an address in which he dwelt upon the necessity of giving voluntary assistance towards the saving of ships and their crews and cargoes when in peril, and in this connexion he cited the example of foreign countries. He urged the members of the Society to labour assiduously for the further development of the society's work. Count Yoshii, Superintending Secretary, in thanking His Imperial Highness for the address, said on behalf of all the members that they would use their best endeavours towards the accomplishment of the aims of the society. Medals of merit were presented to some twenty-five noblemen and gentlemen, including Baron Aiura and Mr. Ozaki, Mayor of Tokyo, and about twenty leading business men were elected honorary members. The usual day fire-works were displayed and a band enlivened the occasion.

One of the lessons of the war is dealt with in a lecture recently delivered at St. Petersburg by Captain Solovieff, who served with one of the Siberian regiments throughout the war with Japan. He notes that the effect of smokeless powder and long-range punishment from an unforeseen enemy upset all preconceived methods applied to the Russian troops. They had been told not to fire except at short range, and at some well-defined object, but when they found that every advance had to be made in the face of a perfect storm of projectiles human nature compelled them to hit back, and to sustain their morale their officers had to give them the order to open fire on almost invisible targets, at impossible distances. As an instance of the waste of ammunition, Captain Solovieff mentions that one regiment alone used 1,200,000 cartridges at the battle of Liao-yang, an average of 640 per man, or about 50 per cent. more than the maximum allowance of a French infantry soldier. The attack had to be made in isolated rushes, ending with a bayonet charge, which could not be attempted until the assailants had established themselves under cover 20 or 30 yards from the enemy's position, instead of the formerly accepted distance of 200 yards. Out of every 100 men put out of action Captain Solovieff credits 85 to infantry, eight to artillery fire, and seven to the bayonet. Under such conditions the greatest need of the ordinary soldier is moral support from his leaders, and the lecturer added that a larger proportion of officers must be provided.

After noting that Mr. Charles A. Moore, the American manufacturer, at a meeting of the National Civic Federation, quoted with words of approval from a statement made by Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, president of the Illinois Central Railroad, in regard to the waste and lavish expenditures of the American people, the Wall Street Journal says: "If every person in the United States should affect a retrenchment in his living expenses amounting on an average to five cents a day, the aggregate saving to the whole country for 300 working days of the year would be $1,200,000,000. Now put that sum by the side of the annual consumption of wines and liquors in the United States and see how the comparison looks:—

per capita) .....	$1,200,000,000
Consumption of wines and liquors ...	1,658,000,000

The consumption of wines and liquors is one of the items in which material reduction could be made in order to effect the moderate saving which has been indicated. There is, however, a woeful waste in the consumption of food. It has been said that a French family could live on the food which an American family throws away every day, and while this may, in a degree, be an exaggeration, yet it contains a large element of truth. The French people are notorious savers, and they are also the greatest small investors in the world. A saving of a billion dollars in the living expenses of the American people would add an enormous sum to the investing power of the nation. This is not the only economic feature of the matter. This extravagance of living soon becomes a settled habit, and the luxuries of to-day become the necessities of to-morrow. They weaken the fibre of a country and reduce its producing power in competition with other nations whose people practice economy."

The American press dearly likes a sensation, though some of the newspapers rise superior to the allurements of the "yellow" writers, and among them is the New York Commercial. We are therefore rather surprised to find in its staid columns the following telegram under a big "scare" head:—

London, February 26. ...
Repeated break-downs of the District Underground road are vying with other factors to produce a crisis in the shares of that property. Its management under the late Charles T. Yerkes is accused of unjustifiable financial inflation, and of subordinating quality to cheapness when placing orders for rolling stock abroad. The outcry against the overcrowding of trains and the consequent danger of a terrible disaster, together with objections to the violent startings and stoppings, is driving throngs of people back to the omnibuses and surface railroads.
Yerkes is accused of having shaken down Charing

Cross station, cracking the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, undermining the foundations of countless buildings, and jarring an arm off the Nelson statue in Trafalgar Square. Lines recently opened have created excitement among the guests of the hotels on the route. The passage of the trains is distinctly heard, and some persons have left their beds in the middle of the night for fear of a collapse.

Engineers assert that the subways are drawing the underground streams out of their accustomed channels, causing a shifting of geological conditions in parts of London where the borings are the most numerous. The motor omnibus, while multiplying rapidly, is unable to cope with the demand. It leaves the horse bus far behind in the race for business. The Yerkes lines are most affected by the prevailing anti-underground feeling, but the fact that the Yerkes properties are not alone subject to accidents was proved by the tie-up of the Central Underground road yesterday for half an hour, during which the tube was in total darkness and the passengers were with the greatest difficulty restrained from panic.

Two cases of small-pox were found among the Chinese passengers on board the steamer Minnesota, which arrived at Yokohama at 3 p.m. on March 27th from Hongkong via Kobe. The ship was ordered not to proceed inside the breakwater. The following morning she was removed to the Nagahama quarantine station for disinfection after which she arrived in harbour in the evening.

Lieut.-General Matsunaga, Commander of the Nagoya Division, who left Dairen on March 25th by the hospital ship Kohina Maru, arrived at Ujina on the 28th. His condition is reported to be still serious. Lieutenant Matsunaga, one of his sons, is with him.

The formal appointment of Mr. U. Makino, late Minister to Austria, as Minister of Education, was made on March 27th.

A disastrous explosion of gas took place at 10 a.m. on March 28th at the Shoko coal mine near Nagasaki. From telegrams in Tokyo papers, we gather that 234 persons lost their lives.

According to a telegram to the Jiji, the Russian revolutionaries at Nagasaki, who, as already reported, are arranging to publish a daily paper to be called Liberty, intend also to start a general printing and publishing office with a capital of ten thousand yen. It would perhaps be supererogatory to suggest to these gentlemen that the success of their projects will largely depend on their own circumspection.

Some of the useless artillery at Port Arthur is to be removed to Tokyo, and a number of the guns will be placed in the grounds of the Imperial Palace as memorials of the war. The following pieces will arrive shortly at Yokohama in the transport Niigata Maru: Seven 23-cent., and one 20-cent., breach-loading cannon; five 15-cent. quick-firers, and various other guns of 12 and 13 centimetres.

AOYAMA GAKUIN, TOKYO.

The Graduation Exercises of the School of Theology, the College, and the Academy of Aoyama Gakuin were held in the College chapel on Wednesday afternoon.

The programme was as follows: Devotional Exercises, led by Dr. S. Ogata, Nagoya; Instrumental Solo, Rev. E. S. Cobb; the Imperial Rescript and National Anthem; conferring diplomas; remarks by President Honda; replies by class representatives; Vocal Solo, Mrs. J. L. Cowen; Address by Bishop Bashford, of China; Vocal Solo, Rev. G. F. Smith, Nagoya; Address by His Excellency Manjiro Inagaki, Minister to Siam; quartette by students; the Benediction, by Bishop Harris. Both music and addresses were greatly enjoyed, and the exercises, as a whole, were spoken of as the most successful the school had held.

Two graduates from Philander Smith Biblical Institute, sixteen from the College, and twenty-six from the Academy. The graduates of the Academy enjoy the same privileges, as regards entrance into government schools of higher grade, as the graduates of regular government middle schools, and the graduates of the college may receive from the Department of Education certificates qualifying them as licensed teachers in middle, girls' higher, middle, and normal schools.

The attendance of College and Academy students at the close of the school year was, Academy 240, College 111, an increase in two years of 50 per cent. in the Academy and 100 per cent. in the College. The total enrolment for the year just ended was, Academy 320, College 164.

A new brick building for classes and administration, built at a cost of over 60,000 yen, is now ready for use, and the added accommodation thus provided is likely to result in largely increased attendance.

The purchase by the Tokyo Electric Railway Co. of 48 feet frontage of the school grounds, will bring the compound, at an early day, into still closer connexion with the city's street-car system.

SEOUL-FUSAN RAILWAY CO.

AMERICAN CONSULAR SALARIES.

THE resignation from the American Consular service of Mr. JAMES W. DAVIDSON, so well known throughout China and Japan, and for many years a valued contributor to the columns of the Japan Mail, has drawn forth several forcible expressions of opinion from the press of his native land regarding the necessity for putting the American diplomatic and consular services on a higher scale of pay. Mr. DAVIDSON has had to resign the post of United States Consul at Antung owing to the inadequacy of the salary attached to the position. His reasons for resignation, remarks the Toledo Blade, apply to many American Consulates. "By the time our representatives in London and Paris have paid rent for quarters suitable to the dignity of their office, they have used up most of their salaries. It has been Uncle Sam's custom to appoint wealthy men to these positions, men who were willing to pay the price of representing this country abroad. Such a system is radically wrong. It is in effect a mild species of bribery, and should not be tolerated. Congressman LONGWORTH is on the right track with his bill, which provides for the purchase of homes for our foreign consuls, homes commensurate with the importance of the office and comporting with the dignity of the nation." The latter part of this comment is echoed by the Cleveland Leader in its declaration that this "little incident ought to shame the members of Congress who are opposed to consular reform because it threatens to lessen the number of political jobs at their bestowal." Not only consuls but diplomatic representatives are underpaid, says the Baltimore Sun. Whatever the merits of the case in regard to ministers and ambassadors, consuls should receive better pay. "The consul is a business man. He is sent abroad to guard the commercial interests of Americans and to promote trade. He ought to be paid on a business basis when he is worthy and efficient. It is false economy to adopt any other policy. An inadequately paid consular service must become in time an inefficient service—and such a service is not worth maintaining at any cost." Mr. DAVIDSON's statement that America is made to appear at a disadvantage as compared with the consuls from other Governments is declared by the Columbus Dispatch to touch the national pride: "It is not pleasant to think that other nations are getting trade because they are more generous in their appropriations for the work of going after it. It would seem to be time to size up the business that is to be gained and put a proper valuation on the services that are necessary to get it. Perhaps Mr. DAVIDSON overestimates the advantages to be gained. If he does not—well, the United States can afford to pay as much for trade-getting as any other nation. Certainly it should not expect its consuls to pay out of their private income for the privilege of representing it abroad."

In this connection it is interesting to note from a cablegram received by the Japan Advertiser that a bill has been introduced into the Senate at Washington by Senator GALLINGER fixing the salary of the President at $75,000 a year, that of Vice-President and members of the Cabinet at $15,000, the Speaker of the House of Representatives at $12,000, and of Senators and Representatives at $7,500 each. If the measure becomes law, it will be the first substantial increase in the salaries of high officials of the U. S. Government that has been made since the salary of the President was doubled in General GRANT's time. The salaries at present paid are: President, $50,000; Vice-President, $8,000; members of the Cabinet, $8,000; Speaker of the House of Representatives, $7,500; Senators and members of Congress, $5,000. Having raised their own salaries to their liking members of Congress may feel more disposed to do the right thing by the Consular and Diplomatic Services. Economy has never been a strong point with American legislators when making appropriations from the national treasury, though fits of "cheese-paring" occasionally attack them. The country itself is always willing to do the generous thing by its representatives, and though in American politics it is the least expected that generally happens, both schemes may by happy chance obtain sanction.

AUSTRALIA'S OPPORTUNITIES IN THE FAR EAST.

COLONEL GEORGE W. BELL, late United States Consul in Sydney, who spent nearly two years in China and Japan recently, has returned to the Antipodes with the firm intention of awakening Australians generally to the business possibilities lying before them in the Far East. Australian trade commissioners have been frequent visitors to China and Japan during late years, while the number of Australian merchants doing business in or with this quarter of the globe is steadily increasing. Still the great bulk of the denizens of the Australian Commonwealth are strangely indifferent to the opportunities which lie almost to their hands in the Far Eastern trade. Col. BELL's address before a Sydney audience the other day, though here and there open to criticism contains much solid truth. His text was "The Empire of Business," and in the course of his remarks he said:—

Away in the East there had just risen a new star, great and grand enough to engage the thoughts of the business brains of our race, and one which could not be overlooked by business people. Half a century ago Japan was only a name, now that country was a mighty factor in the world's commerce. In the last 50 years Hongkong had grown from a tiny village to the second or third port of the world, and it only got the fringe of China's trade. When China woke what would that port become? That was only one instance of what business could do, but the time was coming when Shanghai would soon be the greatest port in the world—when compared with it London and New York would sink into insignificance.

One could measure a nation by her ledgers.

Russia, with her 120,000,000 of inhabitants did not import as much as 4,000,000 Australians, and everyone knew that Australia was in advance of Russia—Australia was more civilised—why? Because her commerce proved it. A little more than 50 years ago China was only a geographical expression to educated men, and China had been, and ever would be, an enigma to the Occidental. But China had a great field of commerce, and that field could really only be reached through Japan, which would reach out and absorb the commercial instincts of the West, and apply them to China. Even America had been crawling along at a snail's pace compared to Japan, and Americans were the salt of the earth, as far as hustle went—at least, they thought they were.

China would shortly need 200,000 miles of railway, and she would want them quickly when she made up her mind. Australians occupy the happiest position of any people on this globe, but lack one thing—people. Commerce was knocking at their gates, and the future prosperity of Australia was hanging on the population question. America brought men by contract to populate her lands. She placed strong, sturdy men from Europe, on her lands and now those men were the finest asset of the States. Other men with a little money followed them. The States had proved to the rest of the world what a steadily increasing population could do for a country, and business—well, America was the land of business.

Australia certainly has great advantages beside those of contiguity in developing trade between herself and the countries of the Far East. But the question is can she take the opportunity by the hand and push it for all it is worth? COLONEL BELL lays his finger on the Commonwealth's weakest spot—the lack of population. The legislation favoured by KING DEMOS frightens away would-be wealth-producing emigrants, while the steady fall in the birth-rate prevents the population increasing at the rate normally prevailing among a young and prosperous people. The action of the Labour party, too, locks up capital, and capital is required for the successful prosecution of overseas trade. Glancing over a recent file of Australian papers we came across the programme which the Socialist-Labour conferences were to discuss in their midsummer sessions. One of the resolutions to be discussed read thus:—"That all privately-owned land held out of use, or not being used to the best advantage of the State, shall be subject to compulsory sale to the Government or lease to settlers, the price in case of purchase, or the rent in case of compulsory leasing and the period of all leases, to be fixed by a tribunal appointed by Parliament for purposes relating to land settlement; such tribunal also to administer all lands now held by the Crown. That the whole or a portion of the revenue obtained from Crown lands be devoted to the resumption of land near centres of population, of developing the country and promoting class settlement." In other words the Socialist-Labour Party still favour the old dog-in-the-manger policy of dividing the country among the comparatively few residents and excluding all others from participation. But as one leading journal points out, the land question is not the only issue before Australia. The miring population have also something to say respecting what they consider necessary in their own interest, a large number of miners asking that State assistance to prospectors shall take the form of half the regular rate of wages per man, also half the working expenses. This would be an easier and more remunerative arrangement than regular mining work, and make the task of prospecting, however unsatisfactory the results as regards metal discoveries, a popular occupation, or rather recreation. The legislation of the Eight Hours' Holiday, with the compulsory suspension of all industrial operations on that day is demanded; also that nurses and others employed in hospitals and similar institutions be subjected to the eight hour principle, a proceeding which would inevitably largely increase the cost of maintaining such places. With their hands already bound so tightly by similar restrictions there is little wonder that the Australian merchants and the moneyed classes generally are somewhat chary about staking too much upon futurity. Still the logical outcome seems to be that if they cannot utilise their capital at reasonable risks within the borders of the Commonwealth then they must turn their attention to projects lying beyond the seas; and what brighter prospects are there than those offered by the rapid trade expansion of the countries of the Far East?

AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANIES.

"BRADSTREET'S" characterises the report presented to the New York Senate and Assembly by the Armstrong Committee appointed to examine into the real condition of the big life insurance companies doing duty within that State as "one of the most far-reaching and indeed sweeping reports ever submitted to any legislature." Our contemporary goes on to remark that the report embodies some propositions which will be regarded by the large insurance companies as radical in the extreme. It recommends, among other things, that new policies shall not be written by any company in excess of $150,000,000 in a single year. That is, the three large companies, Mutual, Equitable, and New York Life, are to be limited to $150,000,000, and the smaller companies are to be limited to a certain declared percentage of their total outstanding insurance. For the three large companies the limit for new business is calculated to just about keep their business stable under present conditions. The total terminations by death, maturity, expiry, surrender, lapse, and other decrease of these three companies in 1904 were as follows: Mutual, $129,125,280; Equitable, $139,513,210; New York Life, $162,326,114. Other provisions contemplate the standardizing of life insurance policies; the prohibition of the control of subsidiary companies, and of the offering of rebates or bonuses; the distribution of the surplus above 10 per cent. among policy-holders, and the making misdemeanors of such conduct as the borrowing by an officer from his company and his participation in syndicates for the handling of securities. Arrangements are to be made for the nomination of independent tickets upon the petition of one hundred policy-holders; the use of proxies at more than one meeting is prohibited, and publicity regarding accounts of profits and losses and lists of policy-holders is to be made mandatory. Life insurance companies doing business in the State after June 1st, 1906, are to be limited as to the nature of their investments, and to be prohibited from investing in the shares of stock of any corporation except the public stock of municipal corporations or bonds which are secured by the pledge or mortgage of shares or stock to the extent of more than one-third of the value of the entire security therefor. The report recommends the repeal of the provision of the insurance law requiring a policy-holder to obtain the consent of the attorney-general before beginning an action to compel the officers of an insurance company to render an accounting. In spite of the newspaper rumour a few weeks ago to the effect that a limit was to be placed on salaries, the only recommendation to that effect is that all salaries above $5,000 a year should be fixed by the board of directors and not by any committee thereof. Neither is there any attempt to fix the compensation of agents except that commissions should be definitely agreed upon in advance, should be a fixed percentage of the premium for each $1,000 of insurance, and that renewal commissions should be limited to four years and to a certain percentage, say, ten per cent, of the first year's commissions. Total expenses should be limited to the total loading on the premiums. It is expected that many of the propositions embodied in the report will meet with most energetic opposition from the larger life insurance companies. To carry out the purposes indicated in the report the Committee submitted eight bills providing for amendments to the insurance law. These measures cover a wide field, but there are others yet to come. The Committee has received permission from the legislature to submit a supplemental report, in which it is intended to embody standard forms of life insurance policies. With this report the Committee will offer two or three bills dealing with matters of minor importance. It was suggested in the Senate that a date should be set at once for a hearing so that all persons affected by the bills might have ample time in which to consider the measures and to frame possible objections to them. It was decided to hold a hearing before the Armstrong Committee in the Assembly chamber on March 9. There appears to be a disposition on the part of the leaders of the New York legislature to accelerate action on the bills, and it is likely that some of their principal provisions, at any rate, will be placed upon the statute book before the legislature adjourns.

The American press, on the whole, are eminently satisfied with the report. As the Brooklyn Eagle puts it:—

"To those who hoped for much, but feared the Committee would not have the courage to deal with plainly manifest evils, it will be a satisfaction. To some, mainly to be found in insurance circles and the financial world, it will be a bitter disappointment. By all others the report ought to be received with thankfulness that so much good has come out of the Committee's labours."

While most papers agree with the Chicago Daily News that the recommendations urging that insurance companies be made to dispose of investment stocks within five years is a good one, the New York Times thinks it "arguable." The Times, moreover, optimistically believes that the mere publication of the investigation and of the report has already created reforms. It adds: "The cure has been accomplished, too, without the necessity of a resort to the courts." But the Cleveland Plain Dealer, for one, is not nearly so cheerful. "Many of these recommendations," it thinks, "will be bitterly opposed at Albany, especially that restricting the amount of new business and the one relating to suits against companies." And the New York Press remarks:

"We write of these reforms as if they were already accomplished, but this is for convenience of composition. We are far from assuming their hearty reception by the Legislature. Already the Grady and Raines are rushing to the defense of the System from this onslaught. The howl for a hearing on the report, and long delay on the first step toward enactment of the Armstrong bills, are signs of a stormy passage to the statutes, if ever that port is reached while the pirates of Ryanism are abroad."

AMERICAN FINANCE AND TRADE OUTLOOK.

UP till the end of January the United States Treasury had been reporting debit balances in the national accounts until faint-hearted people began to shake their heads and prophesy a big deficit for the end of the financial year. Incidentally President ROOSEVELT was accused of inciting the Administration to abandon the paths of old-fashioned prudence in favour of a policy of extravagance and wasteful expenditure. His critics spoke too soon. By the end of February the tide had turned, and on the 25th of that month, when the monthly balance was struck the excess of Government receipts over expenditures was found to be $1,102,002. The deficits of eight months had been wiped out. This happy condition of affairs seems to have even exceeded the expectations of Mr. SECRETARY SHAW, and when he reported the result to some of the Republican Senators they expressed the opinion that the fiscal year, which ends on June 30th, will see a substantial surplus. The improved condition of American national finance is due entirely to increased receipts from several sources, for the total disbursements have been larger than they were last year. The state of the Treasury to-day, indeed, is in sharp contrast to the condition which existed a year ago, when there was a deficit of $25,405,533. In the month which closed on February 25th there was a balance of receipts over disbursements amounting to $4,475,727. The month's receipts were much larger than those of Feb., 1905, being $48,194,727, as against $44,608,007 in the corresponding 28 days of last year. The February customs receipts were $23,832,524, as against $21,582,645 in the same month of 1904 and the internal revenue receipts were $18,229,031, as against $16,714,470. The expenditures of the Government in the month just closed were $43,719,000, as against $41,416,000 in February, 1905. For eight months ended February 25th, the receipts of the Government were $395,843,572, as against $365,661,210 in the corresponding two-thirds of the fiscal year 1905. This increase of more than $30,000,000 was not offset by any corresponding enlargement of expenditures, for the total disbursements were $394,741,570, as against $391,073,744.

Everything points to a year of prosperity in the United States. The bank clearings for February were far in advance of any previous year in the country's history. The aggregate for the month (ninety-four cities reporting) was $12,379,793,089, a decrease of 23.7 per cent. from the high-record month of January, but a gain of 16.7 per cent. over February, 1905, and to this extent the heaviest February total ever reported. New York City's clearings for February aggregated $8,324,423,523, a decrease of 26 per cent. from January this year, but a gain of 16.9 per cent. over February last year. Outside of New York the total at ninety-three cities was $4,055,369,566, a decrease of 19 per cent. from January, but a gain of 16.3 per cent. over February a year ago. Canada is also sharing in the general sunshine engendered by successful business. Her bank clearings for February aggregated $282,407,273, a gain over February last year of 26.4 per cent. For two months the Canadian aggregate was $610,576,170, a gain over 1905 of 28.1 per cent.

Turning to the export business of the United States we find that January reported full tide in nearly every line which goes to make up the sum total of the country's trade. The total value of domestic products exported during the month was $168,427,940, a gain of 38 per cent. over the largest January aggregate ever before recorded, that of the year 1904, and only 14.5 per cent. below the record December total. The aggregate value of five leading products exported showed a gain of 46.7 per cent. over January a year ago, but "other products," which really cover manufactured product to a large extent, showed an increase of 28.9 per cent. Very much the same showing is made for the seven months' period ending with January. All domestic exports gain 17.3 per cent. over a year ago, and while leading products increase 23.1 per cent., "other products" gain 11.3 per cent. The heaviest proportionate gain was in breadstuffs shipments, but the gains in cotton and provisions were also large.

A writer in the Statist attributes the present big trade development in America, the United Kingdom and elsewhere to the abundant supplies of gold now at the command of the various money markets of the world and the stoppage of the hoarding processes which have long prevailed in Russia, France, and the United States. As the paper points out, Russia will have to part with much of her Treasury accumulations in order to straighten out her tangled finances, while France has nearly as much gold as she requires; and so has the United States. "It seems to follow," the Statist proceeds, "that the new gold being raised in such unprecedented quantities will be more available for banking and for trade than in any past period of the world's history. If that be so, it ought to be possible to increase very materially the banking reserves at home and abroad. The banks, consequently, will be in a position to give accommodation on a liberal scale to their customers. And the customers will be encouraged by the knowledge that they can depend upon assistance from their bankers to engage in new enterprises—always assuming, we would remind the reader, that political scares do not damp the courage of both bankers and their customers. It does not follow in the least that money will be very cheap because the production of gold is on such an unprecedented scale. Unless political scares check enterprise, the very fact that gold is being produced on so vast a scale, and that the banks are in a position, therefore, to give liberal accommodation to their customers, will encourage the commercial community to engage in new enterprise, and this, in all reasonable probability, will prevent money from becoming very cheap. But it is not the cheapness or dearness of money that matters so much. It is the certainty or uncertainty of being able to get it when it is required. Consequently, abundant supplies of gold adding daily and weekly to the bank reserves will put the banks in a position to give liberal accommodation to their customers, and thus there will be a strong inducement for the customers to engage in new ventures. In conclusion, then, we would say that all the economic conditions are highly favourable to a great expansion in trade; that the political conditions for the moment are adverse, and, looking a few months ahead, are too uncertain to permit any man to venture upon a forecast. All that is certain is that if politics allow them free play the economic conditions are such that they will unquestionably produce a very material increase both in the activity and in the volume of trade."

JAPAN FROM A CONSULAR STANDPOINT.

PERHAPS the outstanding features of Mr. CONSUL-GENERAL MILLER's most recently published communication to the U.S. State Department with reference to the conditions of this country are the emphasis with which he dwells upon Government control and encouragement of enterprises and industries and upon the formation of trade combinations, and his almost enthusiastic recognition of the progress which Japan is now making, as well as her unmistakable candidature for the commercial leadership of the Far East. Though Mr. MILLER has been but a short time at his post he has collected a mass of information that should be highly valuable to American merchants and manufacturers—if they will only heedfully avail themselves of the facts laid before them by an acute observer. Mr. MILLER's despatch is practically a greatly condensed review of commercial (in which are of course included financial) conditions in this country. What strikes Mr. MILLER very strongly indeed is the Government ownership and control of public utilities and industries. It is no new thing in Japan. Under the feudal system of old Japan it was exercised in the broadest possible sense. This, he says, is exactly what the Government is doing to-day—but in an even broader way. It does not exact direct tribute, as in the olden times, and the producers receive better returns for their labours. But none the less the Government is exercising a supervision over all the industries it does not control, and fostering in every way the development of new ones. "This application of Government concern in an industrial sense is what is making Japan commercially strong, and what will develop her into a dangerous competitor in the business of the Far East." The Consul-General gives a list of the important monopolies controlled by the State and another of the factories conducted by it, and adds that the great development of the silk industry has been largely due to Government assistance and that the rice industry also depends largely on Government support. In fact throughout the Empire, he maintains, in every line of trade and industry the Government will be found close at hand to render assistance, either expert or financial, through one of its many channels. From this theme he is easily led to write of officially formed trusts. He takes, for example, the recent combination of the various match-making concerns: the Government, viewing the warring competitors, steps in and advises the formation of a trust. The combination takes place and the issuance of an Imperial license virtually shuts off competition and incidentally puts the industry directly under the control of the Government. Passing on, he shows how the Government guards the interests of the people engaged in agriculture by examining scientifically and from an economic standpoint the value of the different fertilizers imported. The Government connexion with the hypothermic banks and with the Industrial Bank of Japan (recent measures taken by the latter to increase the capital of the country for the purposes of commercial and industrial development are outlined) and the subsidized steamship lines are also mentioned. "Such paternalism exists that no one in business pressed by the exigencies of the times, hesitates to call upon banks indirectly controlled by the Government for assistance. In fact the commerce of Japan to-day is almost entirely supervised by the Government. What such an ownership or control forbodes in the struggle of nations for the commerce of their people only the future can determine. Considering for the nonce, the general subject of Government ownership and supervision, one would think such a transaction would engender bitterness among the people. This, however, is not the case. The old system under the Shogunate is of too recent date to stir up much opposition, and, then, the people feel an absolute security in the integrity of the Government and give to it all the support and assistance they can render. The change has been gradual and, more important than all, the people have prospered under it more than at any other time in their history. It is no wonder, then, that Government ownership and direction are invited in many lines." As exemplifying the increased prosperity of the nation Mr. MILLER alludes to, the rise in wages, the growth of the porcelain trade (into which, he remarks, the spirit of combination has also entered) the development of the cotton industry, and so forth; he notes the large amount of new loans floated abroad, the benefits derived from cheaper money, Japan's manufacturing development, and says: "The vast amount of cheaper labour and splendid industrial skill in the country, combined with the reduction of interest on borrowed capital, together with the broad field of exploitation and markets now assured to Japan throughout Korea, Manchuria and China, make an excellent foundation for commercial and industrial expansion, upon which Japan will proceed to build her new national structure." The last part of Mr. MILLER'S report contains various statistics,—in many sections up to and embracing the first half of 1905—but he will very soon be in a position to furnish much later information to his countrymen who, it is to be hoped, will realise the value of the facts so carefully compiled on their behalf.

YOKOHAMA FOREIGN BOARD OF TRADE.

THE trade reports presented by the Committee of the Yokohama Foreign Board of Trade to the annual meetings of members have ever been remarkable for lucidity and comprehensiveness, and that discussed on Thursday afternoon falls not one whit behind its predecessors. Every line of commercial activity in this port is dealt with either in summary or by tabulated statement and the result is a valuable document that can be studied with profit by all sections of the commercial community. Among the most striking tables is that setting forth the gradual increase in the volume of the import trade in the 14-year period extending from 1892 to 1905. At the beginning of this term total imports for all Japan reached yen 71,324,776 in value; at the close they amounted to the astonishing figure of yen 488,538,017. Looking back among the files of the Japan Mail for the last twenty-five years it is instructive to note how the pessimistic prophecies of the '80's have been falsified in nearly every particular. So far from Japan being "completely played out," as the current phrase then went, the commerce of the country was but pacing at the starting-line of a vigorous and continuous expansion. The table shows this so very thoroughly that we take the liberty of reprinting it:—

Year.	Imports. Yen.
1892 .....	71,324,776
1893 .....	88,257,172
1894 .....	117,481,995
1895 .....	129,260,578
1896 .....	171,674,474
1897 .....	219,300,772
1898 .....	277,270,728
1899 .....	220,050,983
1900 .....	287,261,845
1901 .....	255,816,644
1902 .....	271,731,258
1903 .....	317,135,518
1905 .....	488,538,017

The Foreign Board of Trade points out that even with regard to the last two years the Customs returns "do not afford an accurate idea of the volume of Japanese purchases, because many articles destined for the seat of war were treated as 'transshipment cargo,' and were not entered at the Customs. On the other hand, it may be safely stated that a large percentage of the increased trade shown by the Customs statistics of the last two years can be attributed to the war under three headings:—

Materials imported for direct or indirect supply to the Military and Naval authorities.

Materials imported to replace the products of Japanese mills and factories engaged by the Government for the manufacture of war supplies.

Luxuries imported as a consequence of the general prosperity resulting from the free disbursement of Government monies in the purchase of war supplies."

The Board therefore utters a note of warning lest the business community be led to entertain too optimistic a view of the future. It says:—

"These causes will continue operative during the early months of 1906, so that the volume of trade is unlikely to return to normal figures until 1907. While the ordinary trade of the country has continued fairly prosperous, the development has not been very great, and it would seem that importers must be prepared for a falling off in their turn-over as compared with the years 1904 and 1905.

Turning to exports we note that the year closed with a falling-off in the export of raw and manufactured silk to the extent of nearly yen 25,000,000, while bamboo manufactures decreased yen 60,989, straw plait, yen 1,338,504; tea, yen 2,249,514; camphor, yen 601,964; and yet "in spite of this decrease in the principal item, the total exports for 1905 are greater by about yen 2,250,000 than for 1904, and, although this sum represents a very small percentage of increase, it is still a matter for congratulation that the total trade has been so well maintained during a period of war."

The Asiatic markets are still Japan's best customers, as the following figures, relating to the destinations of the country's exports last year, demonstrate:—

	Yen.
Asia .....	162,800,000
Europe .....	54,200,000
America .....	97,300,000

Exports to Europe and America have fallen off in both cases, the figures for the previous two years being:—

	1904.	1903.
Europe .....	72,400,000	70,300,000
America .....	104,600,000	85,700,000

China and Korea will undoubtedly be the best fields for Japan's commercial exploitation and we expect her trade with those countries will expand as rapidly as these lands are opened up to commercial enterprise, and that her ratio of increase will be larger than the increases of other countries, the advantages of contiguity and racial sympathy being all on her side. Of course America and Europe will continue to be Japan's best customers for silk and tea, but for the productions of her mills and factories her best endeavours should be devoted towards pushing her Asiatic trade. We have but little space left for further comment on this interesting trade report, but one paragraph dealing with habutai deserves notice. We quote it in full:—

Further efforts have been made to place the question of weight upon a reliable basis, but, so far, with only partial success. The Government inspectors, both in Fukui and Kaga, now stamp the weight of the Silk upon the end of each piece of 50 yards, but unfortunately their method of weighing (on perchance the integrity of the inspectors), is not so trustworthy as it should be. Moreover, different bases have been established in those two centres, seeing that while the official inspector in Kaga stamps the actual weight of the artificially dried Silk upon the end of the piece, the inspector in Fukui adds to the net weight of the dry Silk approximately 3 per cent. (to allow for the normal absorption of moisture), and stamps this gross weight upon the Habutai. This dual standard naturally gives rise to some uncertainty, and also leaves room for question, instead of placing the matter upon an absolutely reliable basis. Taking advantage of this uncertainty, some houses (both native and foreign), continue to deal in material which contains excessive moisture. Perhaps in some instances the buyer is ignorant of the fact that he is paying for water as well as Silk, in other cases the adulteration is condoned or winked at (especially if the price is reduced), but in some quarters the "doctoring" is still too deliberately practised to bear a lenient construction, and against the continuance of these fraudulent methods too strong a protest cannot be made. The material shipped to the American market is practically free from any such adulteration, but many pieces still sold to the European consumer certainly contain more than the normal percentage of moisture. The suggestion raised last year should again be emphasized, namely, that all buyers either in America or Europe, should rigorously insist upon paying only for the net weight of the Silk, while the Japanese Government should, if possible, be persuaded to adopt a uniform basis both in Fukui and Kaga.

The remarks at the meeting by the President, Mr. E. C. DAVIS, with reference to the paucity of the attendance were exceedingly well-timed, though doubtless many of the absentees could afford more or less satisfactory business reasons for their failure to be present. It is disheartening for a Committee that has given time and care to the affairs of the Board of Trade during the year to find that only a baker's dozen of their fellow members are sufficiently interested to appear on the occasion when their report is presented. Mr. BEART was certainly justified in calling attention to the fact that the agents of the leading steamship lines made a point of attending. Readers will not fail to give due attention to the Chairman's short but suggestive address, to Mr. SALE'S outspoken remarks as to the future, and to the short dialogue that ensued with regard to free trade and protection in Japan. Whatever view may be taken of the subject there can be no manner of doubt that it calls for the serious attention of all foreigners who are in any way—and who is not?—connected with trade in this country.

IMPERIAL DIET.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1 p.m. on March 23rd. At the outset, Mr. Ema made a lengthy speech on the Tokyo disturbances of Sept. 5th and 6th last. He strongly condemned the Katsura Cabinet for the interference of the Tokyo Metropolitan Police, and referred to the policy of the Duke of Buckingham, the notorious minister in the reign of Charles I.

The Order of the day was then taken up. Mr. Kurihara, Chairman of the Special Committee on the Government bill regarding the revision of the Customs tariff, gave an explanation as to the proceedings of the committee. The bill was at once passed without discussion through the second and third readings.

The private bill regarding the revision of the Press Regulations aiming at the prohibition of the reproduction of telegrams from newspapers without permission of the original journals—was rejected after a brief discussion.

Several other private bills were then brought in, some being rejected and some passed, after which the House rose at 4.28 p.m.

The House met at 1 p.m. on March 24th. Mr. Fuji, Chairman of the Special Committee examining the Government bill regarding the examination of raw silk, delivered a speech. He said that the committee had rejected the bill on the grounds (1) that the forcible examination of silk by Government inspectors would interfere with foreign business in this important staple, the annual export of which now amounts to a hundred million yen; (2) the imposition of fees for examining silk would discourage the trade; and (3) such examination would cause delay in the export business. The bill was at once rejected. A private bill regarding the prevention of leprosy was handed to a special committee, after which some Government and private bills were discussed. At 3.30 p.m. the House rose.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House met at 10.10 a.m., on March 24th. The House gave post facto consent to the Government disbursements from the Reserve funds, and in other connections, during the war. The House also passed Bills to establish Institutes for Invalids, to amend the Military Pension Law, to amend the Law of Subsidizing Farmers' and Mechanics' Banks, and to amend the Law of the Houses.

The House rose at 11.40 a.m.

At 10.20 a.m. on March 25th, the House sat again in spite of its being Sunday. The discussion lasted for about an hour but no special business was transacted with the exception of Government bills regarding the expenditure on official shrines, etc. These bills were passed as approved in the Lower House.

At 11.40 a.m., the House rose.

The House sat at 10.10 a.m. on Monday. Viscount Karahashi, Chairman of the Committee to investigate the Bill for the amendment of the Soy Tax Law, reported that the Committee had approved of the Bill, which was then passed.

The House also passed the Bill relating to legislation in Formosa as amended by the Special Committee.

Mr. Taizo Namura, Chairman of the Settled Account Committee, reported to the House that the Committee found that six items of payment made by the Government in 1903 were illegal or ill-advised. The House adopted the report of the Committee.

The House adopted 21 various petitions and rose at 11.05 a.m.

The Diet will probably sit 3 days longer.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 1 p.m. on March 26th. After various argumentative questions had been put to the Government delegates by Messrs Muto, Hanai and Motoda, with regard to the urgent Imperial Decree proclaimed at the time of the disturbances which occurred in Tokyo, and to other affairs, the Order of the Day was taken up.

The Government bills regarding the accounts of the Imperial Railways; the revision of the Law of Government Railway Materials and Accounts, accounts of the Japanese Railways in Korea, the appointment of financial officials for the railways to be purchased in accordance with the Railway Nationalization Law, and the Seoul-Fusan Railway Purchase Law were brought in jointly.

Mr. Sakatani, Minister for Finance, spoke briefly on the bills. He said their object was to facilitate the financial management of railways. The bills were handed to a Special Committee without discussion.

After a short investigation, Mr. O-oka, Chairman of the Committee, returned and explained the proceedings of the Committee, and the bills were passed at once without being subjected to the second and third readings.

The Government bills regarding the re-assessment of building lands, etc., were also passed. Several private bills were then brought in and these were all passed, as the various committees reported favourably on them.

The House rose at 6.30 p.m.

On March 27th, the House met again. A short business session was held and the House then rose.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House sat at 10.08 a.m. on March 27th. The Government bills regarding national loans, revision of the Registration Law, etc., were passed, after which the bill with reference to the revision of the Customs Tariff was brought in. The Chairman of the Committee made an explanation as to amendments by the committee. Subsequently, after a brief discussion, the bill was passed. The amended bill was at once sent to the Lower House where it had been passed without amendment. The Lower House refused to confirm the amendments. A Special Committee consisting of ten, was elected by each House in order to bring about agreement. After consultation by the joint committee from both Houses, concessions were made, the result being that duty on printing paper was fixed at one yen per 100 kin; and on all other kinds of paper, yen 1.95 per 100 kin. The Railway Nationalization Bill was then introduced. Marquis Kuroda, Chairman of the committee, reported its proceedings, and said that the committee adopted the amendment of Count Ogimachi (vide last issue of the Japan Mail). A debate took place over the bill and the amendment.

The essential points made by the opponents of the bill were that the time appointed for the purchase of the private railways and the measures proposed to be adopted by the Government for the purpose are inadmissible. The supporters of the bill held that the Government had taken a favourable opportunity to purchase the railways and that there need not be any anxiety as to the increasing of loan bonds. The loan bonds to be issued for the purchase of the private railways would take the place of the railway shares which were in fact a loan to the railway companies. At this stage, the House rose for tiffin at 11.50 a.m.

The House met again at 2 p.m. A warm debate took place lasting about four hours. On the motion of Prince Nijo, the discussion was concluded and the bill passed the first reading. It also passed the second and then the third readings. The committee who had met the committee of the Lower House on the Tariff Bill, appeared and the Chairman reported what they had done. At 6 p.m., the House, sending the amended Railway Nationalization Bill to the lower House, rose for a short rest.

When we went to press, no information was to hand as to whether the lower House made concessions with regard to the amendments of the Upper House on the Railway Nationalization Bill. The general belief was that the lower House would consent to the amendments. It was also believed that the result of the negotiations by the Committees of both Houses on the Tariff Bill would be passed by the Peers.

THE TARIFF BILL.

On the night of March 27th, the Tariff Bill was brought up in the Upper House after concessions had been made by the Lower House, and was at once passed.

THE RAILWAY NATIONALIZATION BILL—A DISGRACEFUL SCENE.

As already reported, the amended Railway Nationalization Bill was passed in the Upper House on Tuesday. Subsequently it was returned to the Lower House. At 7.50 p.m. on March 27th, the House sat again. When the amended Railway Nationalization Bill was introduced, Marquis Saionji, Premier, appeared in the rostrum and delivered a speech. He said that the Government, of course, was desirous of having the Government bill passed without amendment. In the Upper House, some amendments had been made and the Bill passed the House with those modifications. The Government saw no way but to accept the amendments. He asked the Lower House to give its consent to the amended Bill as passed by the Upper House.

Mr. Haseba presented a motion to give consent to the amendments made by the Upper House, without discussion. In spite of the remarks by some members belonging to the Progressists and the Seiko Club, previous to the present sitting, Mr. Sugita (Seiyu-kai), President of the House, declared that the motion had the approval of the House. This declaration was the signal for a great disturbance. Messrs. M. Kato, T. Nishimura, S. Shindo, and Asano, rushed furiously towards the seat of the President and declaimed against his declaration. Messrs. T. Moryori, K. Moto and other members belonging to the Seiyu-kai and Daido Club, proceeded to the President's assistance. After a violent altercation the members of Parliament began to fight among themselves. Some of them kicked others down from the rostrum and others sustained various injuries. The fighting lasted for about twenty minutes, when the trouble was settled by the interference of the police. During the fighting, many members retired from the House, excepting those attached to the Seiyu-kai and the Daido Club, numbering 214 in all. Finally the amended bill was declared to be unanimously carried.

CLOSING THE DIET.

On Wednesday at 11.25 a.m. the closing ceremony of the 22nd session of the Diet was held in the House of Peers. Marquis Saionji, the Premier, read an Imperial rescript as follows:—

"We hereby notify the members of the House of Peers and the House of Representatives that We to-day order the closing of the Imperial Diet and at the same time appreciate the diligence of the members."

The Premier and other Ministers of State afterwards entertained the members of both Houses at tiffin in the Imperial Hotel.

YOKOHAMA FOREIGN BOARD OF TRADE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Foreign Board of Trade was held at the Masonic Hall on Thursday afternoon. Mr. E. C. Davis presided and there were also present Messrs. W. T. Payne, J. A. Harmssen, C. Griffin, L. Roux, M. Beart, B. Runge, D. H. Blake, F. J. Abbott, V. Heller, V. A. Caesar Hawkins, C. V. Sale, B. C. Howard, V. R. Bowden, J. E. Beale (Secretary).

The minutes of the last meeting were taken as read and adopted on the proposition of the Chairman seconded by Mr. Heller.

The CHAIRMAN said the next business was to consider the accounts. These did not call for any comment from him. They were very straightforward; the financial position of the Board was very satisfactory. Their fixed deposit was increasing and their income was quite sufficient to offset all expenditure.

On the motion of Mr. Abbott, seconded by Mr. Howard the accounts were passed.

The CHAIRMAN then said:—

GENTLEMEN:—The trade report now comes up for discussion, and in presenting it your committee trust it will satisfy you that the high traditions of this Board have been fully maintained. The remarks which I had the honour of addressing to you this time last year can, up to a certain point, be applied to the trade of the year 1905. The influence of the extraordinary imports for war purposes made itself felt nearly to the same extent as in 1904, and the enormous increase in most branches of the import trade may be traced directly or indirectly to the war. To mention a few cases, I would especially cite machinery and locomotives, drugs, army woollen cloths and blankets, cotton drills, raw cotton, iron and steel of almost every description, leather, shirtings, oil cake and many others in a smaller degree; whilst there was a noticeable decrease in the import of such staple articles as sugar, rice, and kerosene oil. The import trade of 1905 was certainly abnormal, and it is quite likely that most of those articles above enumerated as showing an increase for 1905 will be quoted by your Chairman a year hence as representing a decrease for 1906. Turning to exports, trade has remained very much on the same level as in 1904, the difference on the total exports from all Japan being only two million yen in favour of 1905 on a turnover of about 320 millions. The only notable increases are cotton tissues, cotton yarns and copper, but their gains are nearly offset by decreases in silk, habutae tissues, raw silk, tea, etc., all of which have not shown as good results as the corresponding export figures of 1904. After the declaration of peace—an event which must always make the year 1905 memorable, and which reflects everlasting credit upon Japanese statesmanship—the effect of the stoppage of extraordinary imports was very soon noticeable, and the year closed with a dull tendency, and with the general feeling that stocks of most descriptions were ample to last some time. Although the country suffered from a prospective bad rice harvest, the imports of rice were more or less effectually checked by the heavy import duty, though this does not necessarily mean that the Japanese people have not paid dearly for their native rice. As was generally expected, the Government decided to keep on all the extraordinary war taxes until further notice, a policy which, though very necessary, will not tend to brighten the prospects of the import merchant. Reference was made a year ago to the direct trade of the Japanese with foreigners abroad, and I must again record the fact that the foreign merchant must look to his laurels and strain every nerve to retain his proportion of the country's trade. Before I close my remarks, I feel I must mention what is, I consider, a very serious menace to safe and prosperous trading. I refer to the pernicious credit system at present in vogue in Japan. The practice of taking a merchant's unguaranteed promissory note and delivering the goods against it is fraught with the utmost danger and risk, and doubly so in the present condition of trade. No one in Europe would ever dream of giving credit as it is allowed here, even to firms of wealth and reputation far above any in Japan. This credit system is undoubtedly the outcome of competition, but I cannot help feeling that when bankers at home realise the perilous position of their security, and insist upon their just and proper rights being observed, they will be conferring a great benefit upon our business operations, and will be deserving of our gratitude and thanks. I consider that something should be done to check this evil, and I am sure that any concerted action on the part of foreign merchants will receive the support and sympathy of the incoming committee of this Board. Gentleman, I now invite discussion on the report. —(Applause)

There being no comments, the report was adopted, on the motion of Mr. Howard, seconded by Mr. Runge.

The next business was the election of the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN, replying to Mr. Hawkins, said he was leaving the country in May, but thought his successor, Mr. W. F. Mitchell, would serve if elected. Mr. Hutchison was also leaving the country. The retiring committee was composed of Messrs E. C. Davis, C. V. Sale, W. T. Payne, D. H. Blake, V. Caesar Hawkins, J. D. Hutchison, L. Mottet, J. A. Harmssen and M. Beart.

Mr. BEART called attention to the fact that the meeting was largely composed of representatives of steamship companies, all the leading lines being represented.

The CHAIRMAN said it was a very poor compliment to the Committee that there should be such a small attendance. The Board only met once a year, and when all was said and done the object of their being in this country was trade. He thought when the committee presented the results of their work during the year at the annual meeting the members ought at least to turn out and say something either in approval or disapproval of what they had done.

Messrs. V. Caesar Hawkins and J. A. Harmssen acted as scrutineers.

While the votes were being counted, Mr. C. V. Sale said:—

We have been considering the past; let us cast a glance at the future. Two facts emerge from the recent considerations of the Diet which must have an important influence upon the course of trade. One is the payment due for interest upon and redemption of Foreign Loans, for which a sum of probably yen 70,000,000 or yen 80,000,000 and possibly even yen 100,000,000 will be required annually for some years to come, and the other is the outspoken declaration in favour of a protective tariff.

How is Japan to find the yen 80,000,000 or yen 100,000,000? It cannot be paid in gold because there is no gold production worthy of mention; it cannot be paid by increased agricultural production because it is no longer possible for Japan to feed her rapidly increasing population. There only remains the possibility, unless there is to be great suffering and distress, of increasing the export of manufactured or partly manufactured goods.

The urgent need of the situation is not, however, the encouragement of manufactures to be consumed within the Empire, to be exchanged within the family; that is a policy which may be advantageous when based upon great natural resources or great national wealth but it is in the nature of a luxury. What we really need is the encouragement of manufactures which can be exported, sold to foreign countries in exchange for the cash of those foreign countries.

Judging from the tariff proposals approved by the Diet, there would seem to be an opinion that a similar result may be obtained by adopting a protective tariff, and so encouraging home manufacture, while discouraging imports.

Whatever may be the respective merits of free trade and of protection, there is no doubt that a large and early increase in exportable manufactures will depend upon reducing as much as possible the cost of production, while at the same time increasing the efficiency of the producer. The cost of production is influenced by the rate of wages, and the rate of wages by the price of food, clothing and housing: the cost of all these necessities must, so far as Japan is concerned, be increased by the imposition of a protective tariff, and the burden of these increased costs will fall most heavily, proportionately speaking, upon the worker, and to that extent make him unable to produce exportable goods at a price to meet competition. The efficiency of the producer can be increased by the provision of the best machinery, by extending and perfecting the means of communication, and by organized methods of work.

Under a policy of comparative free trade, Japan's foreign trade has increased from £12,000,000 in 1885 to £80,000,000 in 1905—an increase of £68,000,000. During the same period Great Britain under her Free Trade conditions, and in spite of an unparalleled competition from the other great nations of the world, has increased her foreign trade from £642,000,000 to over £950,000,000—an increase of over £300,000,000. The positions of the two countries relative to their neighbours are much the same and many of the conditions are parallel.

The lesson seems plain, the developments which have taken place under a comparatively free trade policy are an indication of the means to be employed for still further industrial growth. Liberty to import freely whatever may be required, whether Capital, Machinery, Materials or Manufactures. Liberty to choose from what the world is willing to offer in these directions and to utilise it in those productions for which the people of the country are best suited both by nature and environment and for which a ready market can be found abroad.

The object of these remarks is to lead your attention to a subject worthy of serious consideration and study. Personally, I am of opinion that until our exports have been increased to a considerable extent, we must look forward to a period of difficult trade. (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN—I think you said in your remarks that Japan's trade had increased by 68 millions during the last ten years under free trade.

Mr. SALE—Comparatively free trade.

The CHAIRMAN—But during the last three years there has hardly been free trade.

Mr. SALE—That may be so, but during the last two years there has been practically free trade.

The CHAIRMAN—Do I understand from your remarks that you advocate free trade in this country.

Mr. SALE—Yes.

The CHAIRMAN—I do not think it can be successfully carried out, for two reasons,—there are two great obstacles in the way—first of all there is the absence of iron, and secondly, there is the absence of money. If you make free trade it would only tend to increase imports, which would rush in.

Mr. SALE—They will only rush in if they are required. If you look at the goods Japan imported during the last few years you will find that the majority of the articles are materials required for manufactures. And they are increasing all the time. There is very little in the imports of Japan that can be classed as articles of luxury.

The CHAIRMAN—To give an example of the result of a high protective tariff, take the case of kerosene oil, of which I have some knowledge. The fact of protecting Echigo oil has affected it to an enormous extent. It has helped the refiners. They have been able to improve their refineries, to make money by the sale of their oil, and the increase in their trade during the past few years has been phenomenal. And that has been entirely due to a protective duty.

Mr. SALE.—That may be so to a certain extent. The prosperity of Echigo oil may be due to a protective duty, but part may be due to the fact that they have increased their plant, machinery and appliances, and their means of transport have been increased. And if there were freedom to lay down imported machinery and take steps to improve the industry Japan would progress faster than she does.

The CHAIRMAN—I wish the Japanese would take your point of view. But I am afraid that, as you say 100 millions will be required to pay off interest on loans,—and where is that to come from?—they may tax imports for the purpose. But I am afraid their methods are not good enough for that. Of course they have taken America as an example.

Mr. SALE—America is not a parallel country, for her resources are so great. She has free trade within her own borders. It is not a parallel case with that of Japan, because here things must be imported before they can be exported—at any rate any materials into which iron enters.

Mr. BLAKE—Japan has raised her tariff thrice within the last three years.

The CHAIRMAN—The Japanese should establish factories. That is what the country really wants—a stimulus to factories. It should also be noted that the Japanese Government are not giving that protection to private enterprise they should do, inasmuch as whenever a thing begins to pay well they make it into a monopoly.

The Chairman announced that the balloting for the Committee had resulted as follows: Messrs. M. Beart, V. Caesar Hawkins, C. V. Sale, D. H. Blake, W. T. Payne, J. A. Harmsen, W. F. Mitchell, A. G. Weale and V. C. Bowden.

The CHAIRMAN said Mr. Mitchell would be here in a fortnight, and congratulated the members on having such an excellent Committee. He then proposed a vote of thanks to those members of the Board who had contributed to the report. They deserved the best thanks of the Board for the way in which they had done their work.

Mr. BEART seconded and said he would also like to record the meeting's appreciation of the efforts of the Chairman, who was now retiring. Those that had been associated with him knew how hard he had worked and the great interest he had taken, and whoever succeeded him would have a difficult task if they endeavoured to improve on him (applause.)

Mr. PAYNE seconded and the motion was carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN—Thank you very much. What I have done has been a great pleasure to me. I am afraid I have not done very well, but you are kind enough to appreciate what I have been able to do. I must say I have been ably seconded by our secretary, Mr. Beale, who is certainly an indefatigable worker and very thorough in all his ways and work (Applause).

[This concluded the proceedings.

(The Report and Accounts appear in a supplement.)

CHRISTIAN LABOURS IN MANCHURIA.

The work of the Y.M.C.A. in connexion with the army in the field has afforded a peculiarly favourable opportunity for the distribution of the Scriptures among the soldiers, because they were rendered serious by the constant dangers to which they were exposed; and also there was great need of something to divert their minds from the horrors of the battlefield. Through the favour of the War Department all such supplies were forwarded to any place desired, free of all expense.

The following are extracts from the letters to the Agent of the American Bible Society from Secretaries who went to the front for this special work, and also the Chairman of the Committee.

"The good which was accomplished by distributing among our soldiers in the field Gospels, tracts and picture cards, contributed by the American Bible Society, is simply wonderful. Gospels and tracts were the only reading matter many of the soldiers had while in camp. A number of officers especially asked for Gospels, as they thought it the best way to spend their leisure in such reading.

The demand for picture cards was enormous; and often I noticed that one picture served for several scores of soldiers. No doubt that the motive which aroused some soldiers to inquire about Christianity at the front came mostly from their reading Gospels and tracts. J. K. OCHIAI.

After each preaching service at the announcement that the Scriptures would be given to all who wished to have them there was always a rush for them, and some promised us that they would study the book on their return to Japan. We can safely say that many a seed of truth has been spread in Manchuria through the Scriptures; and we pray that by the watering of the Holy Spirit they may bring forth fruit a hundred times.

I am more and more convinced of the great good done by the distribution of the Scriptures. Some of those who were exposed to incessant danger on the fighting line, as well as some of those who were dragging out weary days at the rear said, that they had been given comfort which nothing could surpass by making the Bible their friend. I have reason to believe that the fruit resulting from the Bible distribution was even greater than that resulting from all the speeches and sermons put together.

K. TAKEDA.

From the Secretary-General of the Soldiers' Comforting Department of the Y.M.C.A. Union of Japan (Translation)

Tokyo March 10th, 1906.

Rev. H. LOOMIS,

Dear Sir,—From the establishment of the Soldiers' Comforting Department by the Young Men's Christian Association, you have shown great sympathy in our work; and by the grant of an enormous number of Bibles, Testaments, and tracts have rendered a powerful assistance in giving to the soldiers at the front the spiritual comfort which was the most important object of our work. For this, I thank you on behalf of all the managing secretaries in Manchuria.

Since the opening of the Comforting Department at Chin-nampo, Sept. 15th 1904, till Dec. 31st 1905, 1693 Testaments, 25,596 Gospels and 101,437 tracts have been distributed to the soldiers at the front in compliance with their request. These books were all given with prayer.

The total number of the attendants at the Christian services at the front aggregated 350,000, and we believe great good was done to the Japanese soldiers by purifying their hearts and for the Japanese society in general in improving its morality.

I beg to express again my thanks for your assistance given us in our comforting work, lasting from the beginning to the end; and further pray for the prosperity of the American Bible Society in Japan of which you are Agent.

S. OTSUKA.

From One of the Foreign Secretaries of the Y.M.C.A., who spent some months at the front.

Kyoto March 1906 17.

My dear Mr. LOOMIS:—I take this opportunity to thank you for the help you have given, through the American Bible Society, in supplying Bibles, Testaments and Portions for use in our army work. We have put them to the best of use, giving them out carefully only to soldiers who wanted them; and we have been greatly gratified to observe the way they are appreciated. It has been a striking fact that of all the comforts and pleasures our secretaries had to offer to the men at the front, the religious services and Bibles were the most popular. Often soldiers asked for Gospel talks; and the religious meetings were the most largely attended of all. In three months over 180,000 soldiers attended the religious meetings of the Association. As these men were constantly on the move it is safe to say that a large proportion of that number attended the meetings only a few times; so that the number of different soldiers who heard the message must have been great. The good work has gone on for three months since the above figures were found.

I remember seeing a soldier, a fine young fellow, come into the secretary's office and ask to borrow a Bible. He thought he must go through the same form that was required to borrow other books from the library. The secretary let him sign for it as usual. In two days he returned and said that he had read three Gospels and that it was so wonderful he wished to know if he could not buy the book. When the secretary told him that kind American friends had given the Bibles to them, and that he could have it, the poor soldier went off with a radiant face. This is but one of hundreds of such incidents. May God bless your Society, and the good people who make its work possible.

Yours in His service,

C. S. PHELPS.

From Rev. Y. Honda, D. D., Chairman of the Army Committee of the Y. M. C. A.

The army department of the Young Men's Christian Association Union of Japan desires to express their thanks for the cordial co-operation of the American Bible Society in behalf of the soldiers of the Japanese Army at the seat of war. Though the spoken word might be soon forgotten these portions of the Bible went into camp and field, carrying with them messages of hope and comfort into the hospital and into the trenches before the enemies' camp; and many of them are coming to Japan with the troops to be studied with new interest and respect.

A very large proportion of the lasting good accomplished by this organization is due to the generosity with which you have supplied this material; and to you and your supporters we extend the most cordial thanks.

THE "DIADEM'S" CONCERT.

On Wednesday evening the Amateur Dramatic Club of H.M.S. Diadem gave a very enjoyable variety entertainment at the Public Hall in aid of the Famine Fund. The attendance was not quite so large as might have been hoped for, but the hearty applause which greeted every number, and the frequent encores, showed that the audience were well pleased with the entertainment provided. The programme opened with a capital bass song, "Down among the dead men" by Mr. Norman, L.C.C., and was followed by a patter duet, "Micky Dunn's Party," by Messrs. Skrine, A.B., and Moore, R.M.L.I. Midshipman Burnett, made up as a young lady of fashion, contributed a capital song entitled "Yarns," and the next item, a sailor's hornpipe, particularly well executed by Messrs. Todd and Hubbard, A.S., brought down the house with a vengeance. Mr. Mitchell, L.S., gave an excellent rendering of the baritone song "Queen of the Earth," and was followed by Bandsman Parks in the comic song "The Upper Ten." As an encore Mr. Parks sang an ex-cruciatingly funny comic song, "Has anybody seen my brother Charlie," which entirely caught the fancy of the audience and was received with tremendous applause. Mr. Goodanew, S.B.A. showed himself quite at home on the violin in his selection of airs from that charming opera The Bohemian Girl. Lieut. Hardy, R.N., was down on the programme to sing "Father O'Flynn," but was unable to appear, and in his place Mr. Norman gave a couple of recitations. The Club swinging by Mr. Ibberson, O.S., proved one of the most popular and pleasing performances of the evening and the clever performer was vociferously recalled. The Rev. Mr. Lester, R.N. gave a very artistic rendering of the song "Sing me to Sleep"; Mr. Clarke showed himself a real musician in his piano solo by Bach, and also accompanied the songs throughout with sympathy and skill. Two comic songs by Mr. Jeffreys, A.B., which elicited choruses and great applause from the nautical contingent in the gallery, brought the first part of the programme to a close.

The second part consisted of a nautical sketch, "The Middy Ashore," which introduced some amusing incident and dialogue, in three scenes. The character which seemed to us to stand out the most clearly and amusingly was that of Tom Cringle, Bos'n of the Billy Ruffin (Mr. J. Leach, A.B.), though Mr. A. Middleton, P.D. as Harry Halcyon, the hero of the piece, put in some good work and sang a capital song at the finale. The other characters in the cast were Lieut. Morton, H. M. S. Orion, Mr. T. Ridgers, P.O.I.; Mr. Limberback, a Legal Adviser (Mr. J. Taylor, P.O.I.); Mr. Tonnish (Gunner Daly, R.M.A.); Lady Starchington (F. Archer P.O.I.); Emily, her niece (A. Hart, YEO. SIG.); Annie her maid; (G. Tedd, D.S.) etc.

The Band of the Diadem, under the able conductorship of Mr. H. T. Wright, rendered excellent service throughout, and added much to the success of the performance.

We learn that after deducting the expenses from the proceeds of the concert, the A.D.C. of the Diadem, through Lieut. Money, were able to make the substantial donation of yen 188 to the Famine Fund.

POLITICS IN MODERN JAPAN AND THE PRESENT POLITICAL SITUATION.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

I.

Is it because they are so difficult to understand that politics have such a fascination for some minds? There are people who love the excitement of the surprises which are sprung on them in the political world. They like to feel that nobody quite knows what is going to happen next. Look at the last General Election in England. Its results astonished all the political wiseacres. Hardly anybody seems to have known that in English politics to day the Labour Party had to be reckoned with. It was ignorance of this that rendered the forecasts and calculations of the most astute English political leaders a subject for ridicule. In the game of politics there is so much going on behind the scenes that affects the situation that not even the statesmen who devote their whole lives to the study of political movements and their consequences can tell you what will be the next move on the political chess-board. If the politics of one's own country are often enshrouded in obscurity that seems to be quite impenetrable, how much greater is the unintelligibility likely to be in the case of Japanese politics! We have spent over a quarter of a century in studying Japanese politics by the aid of Japanese contemporary literature. With what the Japanese have said and still say to-day about their political system we are familiar, but still we feel that there is much that is puzzling, much that nobody has explained. The main conclusion we have reached is that the Japanese don't quite know themselves what they want. They are like the rest of the political world: they are busy experimenting. In many of the methods and appliances which Japan has adopted from the West she has been fairly sure of her ground. In weapons of war, in ships, in industrial machinery, appliances, and the like, she has been able to supply herself with the best the world contains. But when she comes to politics, she finds the whole of the Western world engaged in experimenting with different forms of government, and discovers that even the most forward countries are expressing strong dissatisfaction with the manner in which their political institutions are working. "There is a mean in all things," says Horace. "There are, in fine, certain fixed limits on either side of which what is right and true cannot exist." The Western world is still engaged in trying to discover what is the "golden mean" between despotic monarchy and resort to the referendum on all occasions. Democracy has been supposed to be theoretically the best form of government. But democracy in America and democracy in France, and to a certain extent democracy in England, according to some very great authorities, has worked badly. Much valuable information on this subject will be found in Mr. Lecky's highly interesting and scholarly work entitled "Democracy and Liberty." As Japan's political problem, in many of its aspects, is the world's problem, and as in the work above referred to Mr. Lecky has summed up the opinions of the most reliable Western Statesmen on the vexed questions of politics we make a few quotations from his book. On p. 25, Vol. I. (New Edition, 1899) referring to England, Mr. Lecky says:—"The evil of evils in our present politics is that the constituencies can no longer be fully trusted, and that their power is so nearly absolute that they have an almost complete control over the well-being of the Empire. One of the great divisions of politics in our day is coming to be whether, at the last resort, the world should be governed by its ignorance or by its intelligence. According to the one party, the preponderating power should be with education and property. According to the other, the ultimate source of power, the supreme right of appeal and of control, belongs legitimately to the majority of the nation told by the head—or, in other words, to the poorest, the most ignorant, the most incapable, who are necessarily the most numerous. It is a theory which assuredly reverses all the past experiences of mankind. In every field of human enterprise, in all the competitions of life, by the inexorable law of nature, superiority lies with the few and not with the many, and success can only be attained by placing the guiding and controlling power mainly in their hands. That the interests of all classes should be represented in the Legislature; that numbers as well as intelligence should have some voice in politics, is very true; but unless the government of mankind be essentially different from every other form of human enterprise, it must inevitably deteriorate if it is placed under the direct control of the most unintelligent classes. No one can doubt that England has of late years advanced with gigantic strides in this direction. Yet, surely nothing in ancient alchemy was more irrational than the notion that increased ignorance in the elective body will be converted into increased capacity for good government in the representative body; that the best way to improve the world and secure rational progress is to place government more and more under the control of the least enlightened classes." Mr. Lecky continues on p. 27 thus:—"It is curious and melancholy to observe how Rousseau's doctrine of the omnipotence of numbers and the supreme virtue of political equality is displacing in England all the old maxims on which English liberty once rested." The gist of Mr. Lecky's arguments in this part of his work is that English democracy is growing more and more to be the enemy of liberty, which is dearer to the heart of an Englishman than any special form of Government. Writing on this subject, Sir Henry Maine in his "Popular Government," pp. 35, 36, says "Let any competently instructed person turn over in his mind the great epochs of scientific invention and social change during the last two centuries, and consider what would have occurred if universal suffrage had been established at any one of them. Universal suffrage, which to-day excludes free-trade from the United States, would certainly have prohibited the spinning-jenny and the powerloom. It would certainly have forbidden the threshing machine."

Mr. Lecky discusses in his wonted lucid style French Republicanism and American democracy. On American democracy his views are most pessimistic, as may be seen from the following quotation:—"There is one thing which is worse than corruption. It is acquiescence in corruption. No feature of American life strikes a stranger so powerfully as the extraordinary indifference, partly cynicism and partly good nature, with which notorious frauds and notorious corruption in the sphere of politics are viewed by American public opinion. There is nothing, I think, altogether like this to be found in any other great country. It is something wholly different from the political torpor which is common in half-developed nations and corrupt despotisms, and it is curiously unlike the state of feeling which exists in the French Republic. Flagrant instances of corruption have been disclosed in France since 1870, but French public opinion never fails promptly to resent and to punish them. In America, notorious profligacy in public life and in the administration of public funds seems to excite little more than a disdainful smile. It is treated as very natural—as the normal result of the existing form of government."

Neither America nor Americans are to be judged by American politics. But we constantly hear ill-informed Japanese holding up America as Japan's political beacon light, as a country where democracy has been made a thorough success. Some readers of the foregoing observations may ask, what has all this to do with Japan? Japan will never become a democracy. In one sense this is true. Japan will always remain what she is to-day, a limited monarchy. But under this form of government democracy often makes as rapid headway as under pure democracies. In England, for instance, the people rule. And papers like the Spectator never weary of telling us that England is one of the greatest of democracies. The House of Commons is supreme. The question of questions for Japan to settle to-day is the extent to which it is advisable for her to adopt a democratic form of government. The cry in this country during the past 20 years has been Minsei, "Popular Government," Minken, "Popular Rights," and Ji-yu, "Liberty." But Mr. Lecky, in a work covering no less than 1,127 pages, has conclusively shown that in most of the republics of modern times democracy, instead of aiding liberty, has proved its arch-enemy, that the despotism of numbers has proved the most terrible of all despotisms. The nineteenth century made marvellous progress in science, in art and in industry, but in politics it experimented with apparently the most disastrous results. It is surprising that a century which produced the telegraph, the telephone, the phonograph and the etherograph, and which showed such amazing powers of adaptation and invention, should have discovered no more successful methods of governing mankind. Let not Japan suppose that in government there exists any model that she can safely follow. She has to solve her own special problem in her own way. The great Powers of the West like herself are mere political experimenters. Some of the apparently grandest of theories have proved delusions when put into practice. Constitutions that have been drawn up with consummate skill have been so debased in practice as to be no longer recognizable. It remains to be seen how the Japanese Constitution is going to work. That it is working badly now is the opinion of the majority of Japanese publicists. On this we shall have something to say later on. Our principal object in this article has been to show that whereas in science, art, industry and general knowledge Japan has received from the West an enormous amount of thoroughly trustworthy information, when she comes to politics she enters a sea where it is easy to wreck the ship of state, where sunken rocks abound and beacon lights are few, where the most practised mariner finds it hard to know which way to turn the rudder. To go back on her history is to Japan impossible. The political system must in the main be evolved out of the past. This was the gist of Mr. Spencer's advice to Baron Kaneko, given at the time in the Taiyō and reproduced in one of the Monthly Literary Summaries which appear in these columns. "Your Constitution must be based on history and national customs," said Mr. Herbert Spencer. He was satisfied that the written Constitution was so based. But he had serious doubts as to how that Constitution would work in this country, doubts which, as the experience of the past ten years has shown, revealed no little insight into the real nature of Japan's political problem.

ANIMAL TELEPATHY.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Some time ago, a paper was read before the American Philosophic Society in Philadelphia, which had for its title "Thought Transference Among Animals by Touch and Scent." It is not a new subject, but it is perennial in interest, even if all of us do not go so far as to say that in exact proportion to a man's intimate familiarity with wild animals, is his firm belief in their ability to think. Those of our Japanese friends who do us the honour to read this paper, will doubtless agree entirely with that opinion, and yet it must seem strange to many others that the conception which relegates animals absolutely to the category of automata, calling them, with Descartes, the "betes machines," has its supporters in the latest animal psychology taught in Western schools. It is not improbable that the question of reason among animals will eventually and conclusively be proved to the satisfaction of the world. He who hits upon the solution to this interesting problem will be one possessing, as the indispensable requisite, a natural bent in that direction. We do not realize how many men there are now engaged in this search, because they are quiet scientists, and the most thoroughly scientific men are proverbially modest, while these particular ones doubtless understand that there is little sympathy with their work among people generally; but now and then we run across an item in some newspaper or journal of research which shows us that the study of animal intelligence is as absorbing as ever. The successful investigator must have, besides, a predisposition amounting to genius, which shall give him the power of apprehending clearly the workings of the intelligence of animals in their wild state. Needless to say, the study must be supplemented by many years of familiarity with wild creatures, by observation and re-observation, and by mature reflection, and by submitting of conclusions to repeated scrutiny and meditation. All savage and barbarous peoples believe very firmly that animals have faculties corresponding to their own, differing only in degree. Hunters and trappers, who have lived long alone in the wild are here united and share the view of their ruder brethren, and many scientific students are of the same mind.

It will hardly be denied that evolutionists contend, not that we, human beings, are literally descended from any simian, that in zoology there will ever be found the "missing link" which is to connect us direct with any other known or prehistoric order of mammals, but that we with all other mammals, are descended from an identical ancestry. We are not descended from monkeys any more than they are our degenerate offsprings but if their ancestry and our own could be traced back far enough, the two would be found to coincide. If this be true, then our original endowment was the same, and we should expect any faculty that the animals possess to be shared by man, at least by some men, to a certain degree, and this is found to be exactly the case.

The two powers in which animals confessedly excel man, are the powers of scent and that of orientation. Man does possess the latter power in a very rudimentary form, for although most men are singularly without the instinctive sense of direction, yet many men possess it to a limited extent, and most have the rudiments of it. This fact was amusingly illustrated by a certain trapper in the western part of the United States, who declared that man shows something of the dog's ability to refrain from "running on a back trail," that is the possession of some instinct of orientation, although desperately few use it correctly: this "running on a back trail" must not be confused with the almost inevitable tendency we have of circling back to cross our own trail. The particular illustration of this rudimentary sense of orientation, was that of a person who is blindfolded in a room, turned around a few times, and then told to go to a door, or to some other designated point: he will, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, make the attempt to do so. He thinks he knows where the door is, and his action seems to indicate the sense of direction in a rudimentary form. But carrier-pigeons and many other animals are so richly equipped with it that, to say the least, their gift is altogether superhuman. A similar power is possessed by cats: what amusing stories does the statement recall? As for the faculty of scent; no one questions that the so-called lower animals are our superiors here: yet men do possess the faculty in a greater or less degree, generally in a degree infinitesimally less, so pitifully small as to be ridiculous. In the matter of hearing even, we are not comparable to most animals: indeed, one observer has gone so far as to say that man's sense of hearing is so deficient that he is rarely able to determine the exact direction from which a sound, that he hears for the first time, comes unless he has some other knowledge to help him locate it. Wild animals rarely make this mistake, but domestic ones, approaching us as they do somewhat in their restrictions owing to lack of use, occasionally betray a deficiency in this respect. Since, then, we have the special endowments of the lower animals, even if we possess them in only crippled and atrophied form, it is certainly not illogical to assume that they must of necessity, being sprung from an identical ancestry, have ours, even if in vastly less degree.

Reason is claimed as man's special and distinctive attribute: but shall we say that this faculty is absolutely wanting in all animals? May it not well be that they possess it, only with a difference of degree? The intellectual difference between the lowest known human beings and the highest is as great, or nearly as great, as is that between the least favoured human being and the most highly endowed of the other creatures: for example, the beavers, the bees, the wolves. We find a similar gregariousness in the communal life of some carnivorous animals and in most herbivorous animals, that we admit exists naturally among human animals, and it is difficult to reconcile this tendency with utter inability to communicate in some way. Just because we have not yet detected anything in the lower animals that exactly agrees with man's gift of speech, are we justified in denying to them some other means of doing just what we do with spoken words? It may be well for us carefully to examine this suggestion before contemptuously dismissing all hypotheses which might render solution possible. There are not wanting in human experience such remarkable examples as Laura Bridgeman and Helen Keller, of human beings without sight, hearing, speech, or scent, who have nevertheless attained to a degree of education which puts to the blush the success of some who are not deprived of any of their senses, ability to express themselves to others. Is not touch a more subtle means of inter-communication in any respects than even words? Take this in connection with their keenness of scent, and animals are not by any means devoid of something that stands them in good stead for speech. There is another something: faculty shall we call it? which animals seem to have in a far greater degree than man. It is often spoken of as the "aura," and in most simple terms is defined as a sensitive atmosphere or envelope which surrounds certain individuals, probably all but not all to a conscious degree, and which, although apparently very remarkable, is well authenticated. There are many people who, if they go into a dark room where there is another person that keeps perfectly still and is yet so far from the new-comer that the sound of breathing is unheard, are yet immediately conscious of the presence of someone. Evidence of some such faculty as this in animals are numerous; and the potentialities of this quality are not yet guessed at. We generalize too hastily when we speak confidently of the "bête machine."

THE LAW COURTS.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

The sixth sitting in the trial of the politicians who are charged with having instigated the Tokyo disturbances took place on March 23rd in the Tokyo District Court.

A lengthy discussion between Public Prosecutors Sugimoto and Anju, and counsel for the defence took place. The discussion referred to (1) the motive of the accused in reference to the alleged crime; (2) the fact of the crime; (3) the relation between the offenders in co-operation; (4) views on the law with regard to the closing of the Hibiya Park by the Metropolitan Police Office; and (5) the nature of the offence.

The case was adjourned till March 28th.

THE SMITHERS LEASE CASE.

In the Appeal Court on Saturday, says the Kobe Herald, Mr. Inouye Zenkichi applied through Mr. Kimura for the formal cancellation of the interlocutory judgment given by the Kobe Chiho Saibansho on June 8, quashing the judgment in default against Mrs. Smithers. It will be remembered that the action was subsequently retried with the result that judgment was given in favour of the Plaintiff, Mr. Inouye.

CLAIM FOR SHORT DELIVERY.

The case in which Messrs. Siber, Wolff and Co. claim yen 1,541.80 from Messrs. Butterfield and Swire, Yokohama agents of the China Mutual S.S. Co., and the Ocean S.S. Co., for short delivery of cargo, came up again on March 27th in the Yokohama District Court.

I. Hattori, manager of the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha, was examined as an expert witness as to the practice of landing agents. Witness deposed that, as specified by the bill of lading, consignees were liable to take delivery of their goods alongside a steamer immediately after the ship arrived in harbour. The work of taking delivery of cargo from vessels into lighters is difficult and, further, heavy expenses have to be incurred in doing so by several consignees separately. To avert these troubles, the ship's agents appointed a landing agent. Consignees consequently received their goods at the hatoba. Valuable goods stored in a special hold of the ship, however, were received by the consignees on the ship. In the case of such valuable goods, bills of lading are given to one of the mates on the ship who then delivers the articles. In the case of hatoba delivery, the documents were handed to the landing agent after the delivery of the cargo was completed. Application to the Customs for permit to pass the goods was sent in to the office although the goods might not have been delivered. The invoice attached to the application would identify the marks and counter numbers specified in the manifest presented by the ship's agents or the owners. In the case of delivery of cargo alongside the ship, the consignee would apply to the Customs for an examination of the goods on board the ship or lighter.

Examined by the plaintiffs' Counsel, witness said that Messrs. Butterfield & Swire formerly employed Capt. Weston as their landing agent. Last year the firm opened a landing department in its own office and since then had been engaged in landing cargoes itself. The Nippon Yusen Kaisha, Pacific Mail S.S. Co., and the O. and O. S.S. Co., attended to the landing of cargo themselves. Consequently landing charges were paid to these firms by the consignees.

Cross-examined by the defendant's counsel, witness said that to economize time and expenses and also to avert difficulty on board the ship in the taking delivery of cargo, the ship's agent appointed a landing agent. The landing agent was naturally regarded as the representative of the ship's agent, or owner, and attended to the business as a favour to the consignees. In the case of damage arising to landed cargo, the ship's agent personally examined the damage after receiving notice from the consignee concerned.

Plaintiffs' counsel produced a letter copying book and chit-book as evidence and referred to a letter which the plaintiffs sent on May 4th last to the defendants. Counsel said that the memorandum was received by Mr. C. W. Cooper, of Messrs. Butterfield and Swire, and he placed his initial "C." in the chit-book. Defendants' Counsel recognized the letter and the initial.

Plaintiffs' Counsel repeated his statement as to the goods undelivered and said that fifteen pieces of flannelette were contained in one case, each piece being 70-80 yards in length, and fifty pieces of white shirting were packed in one case, each piece being fifty yards in length. Counsel asked the Court for leave to summon an expert to confirm the market price of the articles at the time when they were imported. The Court gave consent to the request. The hearing was adjourned till April 11th.

SUGIYAMA v. SIEMENS & HALSKE.

S. Sugiyama, a merchant residing in Minami-Nabecho, Kyobashi, Tokyo, has filed a case in the Tokyo District Court against Mr. H. Kessler, the representative of Messrs. Siemens & Halske, Tsukiji, claiming yen 26,003.

According to plaintiffs' petition, the Japanese acted on behalf of the defendant firm when the latter received an order for search-light apparatus from the Department of Fortifications. For his services, the defendant promised to allow 7.5 per cent. commission on the amount the firm received for the apparatus. After August, 1899, the firm began to supply the electrical machines and duly received payment in several installments which aggregated over yen 350,000. The defendant firm has not paid his commission to the plaintiff.

The first hearing will take place on April 7th.

CLAIM FOR HOUSE RENT.

A case filed by Mr. H. V. Gielen, against Watanabe, a Japanese merchant, living at No. 156, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, claiming yen 250 for house rent was brought up on March 28th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Nagata.

Plaintiff was represented by Mr. R. Ideura and the defendant by Mr. Y. Fujiwara.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that his client leased a building situated on lot No. 156 to the Japanese defendant in November 1898 for a monthly rent of fifty yen payable in advance. The rent was paid up to the end of September, 1905, but since then no rent had been paid. The claim was calculated from November, 1905, to March this year.

Defendant's Counsel contended that the building, in which the defendant is living, does not belong to the plaintiff and that he hired the house from a Chinaman. Defendant, consequently, did not make any lease contract with the defendant. Counsel further went on to say that the dwelling in dispute was connected with another house over which the plaintiff and a Chinaman named Chong Fan-king are disputing in the Tokyo Appeal Court. Referring to Art. 121 of the Procedure of the Civil Code, defendant's Counsel asked the Court to temporarily estop the present case.

After a brief discussion the Court decided to temporarily suspend the hearing until the case in the Tokyo Appeal Court has been concluded.

CLAIM FOR SHORT DELIVERY.

In the Yokohama District Court, the hearing of the case instituted by Messrs Charles H. Lily and Co., Seattle, against the West Coast Commercial Co., Minneapolis, owners of the American sailing vessel Agenor, which is now in harbour at Yokohama, claiming yen 47,175, began on March 28th in the Yokohama District Court, before Judge Nagata.

Plaintiffs were represented by Mr. H. Sato and the defendant by Dr. Masujima, whose power-of-attorney was given by Captain H. C. Killman, of the Agenor.

Plaintiffs' counsel asked that defendants be ordered to pay yen 47,175 and to bear costs.

Dr. Masujima, defendants' counsel, said that the petition of plaintiffs was made against Capt. H. C. Killman, master of the ship, as he was the representative of the West Coast Commercial Co. According to Art. 566 of the Commercial Code a ship's master is not authorized to attend to any juridical case with the exception of necessary actions for accomplishing the ship's voyage at a foreign port. Further, he said that the plaintiffs' claim was handed to Captain Killman. The Master authorized Counsel to give a reply in the Court and furnished a Power-of-Attorney. Finally, defendants' Counsel presented an objection saying that the ship's master had no authority to represent the ship's owners nor to act as their agent.

The Court made a few enquiries regarding defendants' objection, after which the Court ordered the plaintiffs' Counsel to give an explanation as to the cause of the claim, before delivering a decision on the objection raised by Dr. Masujima.

Plaintiff's Counsel stated that on Oct. 9th last, the sailing ship Agenor left Alaska with 1,120 tons of dried salted salmon for Japan. Previous to her departure, Capt. H. C. Killman, master of the ship, made out a bill of lading, attaching his own signature, which he sold to Messrs Jackson and Co., of Alaska. The document then passed through several hands by sale, being duly counter-signed by the sellers. Finally it was purchased by Messrs Charles H. Lily and Co., who consigned the cargo to Messrs Sale and Frazar, Ltd., Yokohama. After the vessel arrived at Yokohama, in Jan. 1906, only 491 tons were delivered by the ship against the bill of lading specifying 1,120 tons (a ton being 2,000 lbs. according to American calculation). The remainder, 629 tons, were undelivered. The c.i.f. cost of one ton was $37.50 in American money and aggregated seventy-five yen. So long as the ship's master did not deliver the shortage, defendants must be held liable to pay the amount claimed.

Defendant's Counsel maintained his objection as to the juridical capacity of the ship's master, and refused to reply to plaintiffs' Counsel.

At this refusal of defendant's Counsel to give any reply to the statement of the plaintiffs' Counsel, a hot discussion took place.

Mr. Sato—Whom are you representing in this case since you refuse to consider the plaintiffs' claim?

Dr. Masujima—I am representing Capt. H. C.

Killman, of the Agenor, but not the West Coast Commercial Co.

Mr. Sato—I should like to know what your reason is, as my petition is brought against the firm?

Dr. Masujima—You regard Capt. Killman as the representative of the West Coast Commercial Co., in your petition. Therefore I made objection as to the capacity of the ship's master in accordance with Art. 566 of the Commercial Code and 4th Clause of Art. 206 of the Procedure of the Civil Code.

After further discussion, the Court decided to admit the objection of Dr. Masujima. Thereupon, the plaintiffs' Counsel said that the Power-of-Attorney given by Capt. Killman to his Counsel could not be regarded as a proper document and asked the Court for leave to examine Capt. Killman who was, at that time, sitting near the bench. Defendants' Counsel presented a protest against the request. The Court, however, gave consent.

Capt. Killman was summoned. Being shown by the Court the Power-of-Attorney given to his Counsel, Captain Killman said that he had made it out. Being asked by the Court whether he had given it to Mr. Masujima in order to defend the present case, Capt. Killman stated that he did not know anything about the claim at all. He merely gave the Power-of-Attorney to Dr. Masujima asking the lawyer to do his best to release the ship from the legal action as he must leave for home as early as possible. He did not ask Dr. Masujima to put forward any objection as to his legal capacity.

The Court decided that Counsel was not fully authorized by Capt. Killman and Dr. Masujima retired from the Court.

Plaintiffs' counsel stated that Capt. Killman must be summoned as the defendant. The Court then adjourned the case.

PETITION FOR DECISION IN BANKRUPTCY.

An action filed by Messrs Samuel Samuel and Co., asking for a decision in bankruptcy against R. Ogawa, came up again on March 29th in the Yokohama District Court.

A. Ota and K. Tayama, handwriting experts of Tokyo, were summoned to compare the autographs and seals of the defendant on the power-of-attorney given by him to his counsel and those on other documents.

The Court asked the expert witnesses to give their opinions in writing, after which the Court rose.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

The seventh sitting in the trial of the politicians who are charged with having instigated the Tokyo disturbances took place on March 28th in the Tokyo District Court.

A lengthy discussion conducted by the lawyers employed for the defence occupied the whole day, after which the trial was adjourned till April 2nd.

A congress of Armenians and Tartars has been opened at Tiflis under the Presidency of the Viceroy of the Caucasus, to consider means for stopping the inter-racial fighting.

The Dundee jute workers have decided to resume work, thus averting the general lock-out.

Great Britain has asked Persia her reason for rejecting Major Macmahon's award in the matter of the waters of the Helmund, pointing out that Persia is entitled to appeal to the Foreign Secretary, but there can be no question of referring the matter to The Hague. Speaking in the House of Commons Sir E. Grey said that the question of improving the communications in South Persia had been carefully considered, and the Government was prepared to give full measure of diplomatic support to private enterprises, but it did not feel justified in incurring public expenditure. Government will continue to press on Persia the desirability of adopting every measure to facilitate trade with India.

FIRE AT TAKARADZUKA.

A serious outbreak of fire occurred at Takaradzuka on Monday afternoon. At about 1 p.m., said the Kobe Herald, while a celebration of the return of soldiers from the front was in progress, sparks from some fireworks fell upon the thatched roof of a house in the neighbourhood of the baths, and the fire, fanned by the wind, rapidly spread to other buildings, including a small shrine, and gained the main road. The Senzan Hotel was caught by the flames and destroyed, as were also the well known biscuit shop and a greengrocer's store, and several houses in the Nishinomiya direction were likewise demolished. So fierce were the flames when the outbreak was at its height that several trees on the hill behind the Takaradzuka Hotel were burnt, and clouds of suffocating smoke much inconvenienced the Hotel guests. The Hotel itself had a very narrow escape. The fire raged all round it and the flames got so close that the straw coverings over plants in the garden were destroyed, while many sparks fell on the building. Fortunately the latter is well roofed, and thanks to this and the fact that the walls are painted with a non-combustible composition, the Hotel did not suffer any appreciable damage. The guests made preparations for a hasty departure and the servants moved a good deal of the furniture and other articles outside, but fortunately no loss was sustained. Several Japanese hotels were less fortunate and it is feared that the total damage by the fire will prove very considerable. Altogether, about nine houses were destroyed, while two were partly demolished. As far as our present information goes, no lives were lost, but at least one man was severely burned, and two small children owed their lives to the heroic conduct of a young foreign lady from Kobe, who rushed into the flames and rescued them, afterwards restoring them in safety to their mothers. We understand that the fire was the occasion of serious loss to General Ogawa, who stayed at Takaradzuka last year after being wounded at the front and had since kept there about yen 3,000 worth of valuables, all of which were destroyed.

Another paper is to be started to represent Chinese interests.

He paid a visit to Yokohama about the end of last year and seemed then in his ordinary health. He leaves a widow to mourn his loss.

The American banker duly replied.

The Rev. J. Batchelor writes to the Japan Quarterly:—"Miss Hughes' puppy, which had been suffering from distemper for more than a week, died a short time ago. As I was coming down the road I met two of the Ainu dragging the poor animal off, rolled up in a mat, for burial. On looking into the bundle I discovered that the men had put the plate out of which the dog had fed together with its drinking tin into it. Upon asking what they were going to do with these things they informed me that they intended to bury them with the dog! I was somewhat surprised at this, especially as the men were Christians, for although it is well known now that the Ainu, in common with some other races, bury certain utensils with the corpses of human beings, both for use on the way to the other world and also for service when they get there, yet I have never before met with an instance where the like has been done for a dog. The fact is the Ainu believe just as strongly in the immortality of the spirits of the lower animals as they do in those of human beings. With them there is no such thing as a life, of whatsoever order it be, becoming extinct. The dog just buried is supposed, in so far as its spirit is concerned, to be still alive and on its way to the nether world. It is still a dog, and always will be: for, among this people there is no such thing as transmigration of souls in the Bhraministic and Buddhist sense of that term.

AMERICAN TOPICS.

Susan B. Anthony is dead. She was born in 1820 in Massachusetts and after being a teacher for 15 years entered upon temperance, anti-slavery and woman's suffrage agitations.

President Roosevelt has accepted the resignation of Justice Brown of the Supreme Court. Judge Brown had reached the age when he could retire with a pension. His successor is not known, but Secretary Taft's name has been mentioned.

United States exports of bacon to Great Britain, according to British returns for the fiscal year ended Dec. 31st last, decreased from £7,370,000 in 1903 and £6,209,000 in 1904 to £5,828,000 in 1905. During the same period the imports from Canada into Great Britain increased from £1,690,000 in 1903 and £1,865,000 in 1904 to £2,750,000 in 1905. These two countries and Denmark form Great Britain's chief sources of supply, but Denmark also shows a decrease from £4,532,000 in 1904 to £3,970,000 in 1905. These figures are added to bear out a recent official report of Canada's commercial agent at Leeds, England, that Canadian bacon is gaining in popularity every day as against American bacon.

Standard Oil begins the year 1906 as it began that of 1905, for the directors of the corporation on February 15th declared a quarterly 15 per cent. dividend, the payment of which calls for $14,750,730. Although the capital stock of the company is $100,000,000, not quite all of it is outstanding. The dividend for the preceding quarter was 10 per cent. From 1895 the Standard Oil Co. declared annual dividends of 12 per cent; 31 per cent in 1896; 32 per cent in 1897; 30 per cent in 1898; 33 in 1899; 48 in 1900 and 1901; 45 in 1901; 45 in 1902; 44 in 1903; 36 in 1904, and 40 per cent in 1905. No statement has been made by anyone in authority in regard to the story that the capital stock of the corporation may be increased from $100,000,000 to $600,000,000.

Three hundred square miles of the richest oyster territory in the world are to be taken away from Mississippi and become the exclusive property of the State of Louisiana by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was handed down on March 5th. In this territory are a half dozen big oyster factories, and these will have to go out of business or pay a big tax to the State of Louisiana. The factories have offered to pay a license of $250,000 a year to the State for the lease of the grounds awarded to Louisiana, but will have to pay much more. The cash value of the waters which have been in dispute is more than $5,000,000. This is the most serious blow which the oyster industry of Mississippi has ever received, and it is probable that a number of the factories will at once move over into Louisiana territory. The waters in question have been in litigation for five years, but the decision finally settles the case.

"The new Security Building, in Bridgeport, Conn., which is nearing completion, is attracting much attention from engineers and insurance men for the reason that it will be devoid of wood absolutely," says The Record and Guide. "It will not contain a piece of wood as large as a match when completed, and therefore will be absolutely fireproof. In one other particular it is unique, for the reason that it will not possess one solitary piece of a stone in its natural form. The staircases are of the winding order and made of concrete. The building is constructed on the cantilever plan, and it is supported by foundations of unusual strength. The supports extend out under the sidewalk and street, and are solid masses of concrete and iron work. The walls are of concrete, and throughout the whole building no wall is thicker than eight inches. The floors are made of a composition which is fireproof, and the doors, window sills and frames are of metal."

One hundred years will probably see the exhaustion of the world's present iron-ore sources, according to Dr. C. Kenneth Leith, professor of geology in the University of Wisconsin, who lectured February 9 on the subject before the Geographical Society. Professor Leith says that the present known deposits of high-grade ore in the United States will be exhausted in a comparatively short period of time, and then the low-grade deposits will be drawn upon, with the result of changing the geographical location of the great steel and iron plants of the country. "It is probable that the entry of low-grade iron ores into the iron industry will have the effect of bringing the furnaces nearer the base of supply," said Dr. Leith, "and this means the removal of the iron centres from Pittsburgh and other eastern points to Chicago and points farther west. There are deposits of low-grade ore in Colorado and Wyoming, but it will be many years before they will become factors of commercial importance."

Says Bradstreets.—Though first in the production of coal, the United States ranks only third in the list of exporters, being surpassed in this latter respect by Great Britain and Germany. That we have improved in the latter direction is shown by the fact that we exported $31,215,628 worth in 1905, as against $11,000,000 worth in 1895. On examination, however, we find that of the $17,867,964 of bituminous coal exported, $11,500,000 worth went to Canada, and of the $11,104,654 worth of anthracite coal shipped, nearly all went to British North America. Mexico took about $3,000,000 worth of bituminous coal, and Cuba took $1,487,776 worth. Thus our coal trade may be said to be limited almost entirely to our immediate neighbours. The United Kingdom sold about $120,000,000 worth of coal in 1905, or four times as much as did this country. The United States in 1904 produced 314,563,000 tons of coal, Great Britain 232,428,000 tons, Germany 118,907,000 tons, and France 33,303,000 tons.

The aggregate trade of Canada for the seven months ending with January was $44,261,143 greater than for the same time last year. An idea of the enormous growth of the trade of the Dominion during the past few years may be formed when it is pointed out that the seven months shows a greater volume of business by over $66,000,000 than the whole year of 1897, when the British preference was adopted. The imports dutiable and free for the seven months were $156,259,403 compared with $140,484,425, an increase of $15,774,978 over the previous year. The exports were $150,834,433, compared with $125,230,403, being an increase of $25,603,940. The relative increase in exports is greater by over $9,000,000 than the imports. There was an increase in every branch of trade. The output of the mines shows an increase of over $500,000, the fisheries over $3,500,000, the forests $1,500,000; animals and their products, $4,500,000, manufacture heads the list with a little short of $14,000,000. This is one of the best statements of trade ever given out by the customs department. The total aggregate trade for the seven months was $323,616,803, as against $279,355,660. The duties collected increased by $2,000,000. The January imports show an increase of $5,000,000 and the exports for the month of over $5,500,000.

For the first time since the United States came into possession of outlying territories the insular trade of the country footed up more than $100,000,000 last year. It was a good deal more than that amount, for the grand total in both directions at the end of December was $128,196,272 while the aggregate for 1904 was $97,611,570. These figures do not include gold and silver. The people of Alaska declare that gold should be included as a part of the "domestic merchandise" shipments, for gold is one of the principal products of the territory. Hawaii stands at the head of all the outlying territories of the United States in trade with the mother country, but sugar forms 70 per cent of the whole business, and this does not enrich the United States to any great extent. As a market for American goods Hawaii is behind both Porto Rico and Alaska. Domestic merchandise shipped to Hawaii in 1905 was valued at $12,122,261, as against $13,989,619 to Alaska, and $16,423,426 to Porto Rico. The Philippines have not become a valuable market, for the shipments of American goods last year were only $5,738,981. This was a trifle more than in 1904, when the shipments were $5,038,701. The value of goods sent from the Philippines to the United States in 1905 was $15,567,735, and in 1904 $10,225,338.

Commenting on the rapid passage through Congress of the General Pension bill for the current year, The Outlook says:—

It appropriates a total sum of $140,215,000. The cost of pensions to the taxpayers was brought out in a striking way by the report, which showed that while the actual cost of the Civil War was about $6,000,000,000, it now seems probable that the expenditure for pensions will, before the last pensioner ceases to receive payment equal that sum, thus making the total cost of the Civil War to the United States $12,000,000,000, which would amount to three-fourths of the entire wealth of the country when the war broke out. As usual, the report contains some picturesque facts relating to our old wars, such as that there were on the pension rolls last June five names of persons receiving pensions on account of the War of the Revolution, which closed 123 years ago, and that 776 persons are still drawing pensions on account of the War of 1812, the last participant in which very recently died, while for the Mexican War there are 4,540 soldiers and 7,653 soldiers' widows receiving pensions. Arguing from the rate of longevity and marriage statistics shown by these facts and by the known facts about our Civil War pension list, Mr. Gardner, the Chairman of the Pension Committee, draws the conclusion that in 1924 there will still be 346,662 Civil War pensioners. Adding to this number the 132,414 pensioners who, under the same ratio, will in 1924 be drawing pensions on account of the war with Spain, it is estimated that twenty years from now, assuming that we have no wars in that time, the United States will have nearly, if not quite, half a million pensioners on its roll. The generosity of the American people in this direction has been unexampled, and has been aided by a carelessness which is not as commendable as the generosity; there can be no doubt that public sentiment is in favor of a liberal policy in regard to pensions, but it is no less certain that with this liberality should be joined the closest inspection of all claims and careful restrictions to make fraud or error impossible in passing upon applications. The passing of 429 private pension bills by the House one day last week in seventy-two minutes does not seem on the face of it reassuring as to the care taken. One of the provisions of the new bill makes into statute law the Order No. 78 of the President, declaring age conclusive evidence of disability.

Probably the most important and far reaching decision ever rendered in relation to interstate commerce law was delivered by the Supreme Court of the United States on Feb. 19th, when, by an undivided bench, it laid down the new principle that railroads cannot deal in the commodities which they haul over their lines. This decision falls principally on the railroads which directly or indirectly own coal mines and sell their products, but if the courts sustain the claim of the Interstate Commerce Commission that private car lines are common carriers, the principle laid down may also include them, so that the owners of refrigerator cars would be prohibited from using their products. The decision as to coal alone, however, removes what is acknowledged to be one of the greatest evils in the matter of railroad rates. It also enlarges considerably the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, taking it further in that particular direction than was contemplated even by the pending Hepburn bill. The decision was entirely unexpected and the attorneys who argued it were surprised at its broadness. As pointed out by the court, there was no prohibition in the interstate commerce law of railway ownership in commodities, but notwithstanding its absence, it was plain, according to the court, that to hold otherwise would be contrary to the very spirit of the act. The case arose in a suit instituted in the United States circuit court of the district of West Virginia by the Interstate Commerce Commission to enjoin the carrying out of a contract under which the Chesapeake & Ohio agreed to deliver at New Haven 60,000 tons of New River coal for the New Haven Railroad at $2.75 a ton. The price of coal at the mines plus the cost of transportation from Newport News to New Haven was $2.47 per ton, while the published rate from the mine to Newport News was $1.45 per ton, and the bill was based on the claim that this was in effect a discrimination in that the company carried the coal for less than the usual rates. The company denied this, and alleged that it was a loss it sustained on the price of coal and that it took this means to reimburse the New Haven road for some $100,000 which it had lost through the inability to fill a previous contract owing to a strike of miners.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CASE OF MR. FILLINGHAM.

SIR,—In this morning's paper you state that the Dean of Arches remarked that, "the case was unprecedented in the Anglican Church." Where in your opinion should the case of the Reverend John Wesley be tabulated? As we all know he laid hands on the Reverend Mr. Coke, a priest of the Church, and on Mr. Francis Asbury and made them Superintendents of the Methodists in America. This caused his brother Charles to write:—

"Thus easily are bishops made
By man's or woman's whim,
Wesley his hands on Coke hath laid
But who laid hands on him?"

Yours,

HENRY SCOTT.

The Argentine training-ship Sarmiento has started on an educational cruise. She will visit Chinese and Japanese ports.

The highest price ever paid for a collection of stamps has just been given by the publishers of the Stanley Gibbons Monthly Journal, the amount being over £30,000. The collection belonged to Mr. W. W. Mann, who for more than 20 years has been collecting European stamps.

On Feb. 7th M. Loubet, the outgoing President of the Republic, received the members of the L.C.C. at the Elysée. In a touching speech M. Loubet referred to the fact that on the occasion of his election seven years ago one of the first visits he received was from King Edward, then Prince of Wales. The President made it clear that the Entente Cordiale was the principal object of it. Subsequently M. Loubet proposed the health of King Edward, Queen Alexandra, and the Royal Family, wishing unbounded prosperity for the great, glorious, and noble British nation. A ball was given at the Hotel de Ville in the evening.

The largest steel ingot that has ever been made has just been cast at the Manchester Works, Openshaw, of Sir W. G. Armstrong, and Co., Limited. The ingot, weighing 120 tons, was cast on the well-known Whitworth system of fluid pressure—that is, the 120 tons of molten steel were poured out from the melting furnaces into a huge ingot mould box, this box itself weighing 180 tons. While in a molten condition the ingot was subjected to the enormous pressure of 12,000 tons, the action of this process being to make the ingot homogeneous and sound throughout, and free from cracks and fissures.

Lord Roberts addresses to the papers a letter in which he states that the appeal he issued in July last for funds toward the establishment of rifle clubs throughout the United Kingdom with a view to making rifle-shooting a national amusement, has thus far only elicited subscriptions to the amount of £1,860. He confesses his deep disappointment at this result and urges that, whatever help may be afforded by the State, rifle-shooting can never become a national pursuit unless it receives encouragement outside official limits.

The five new ocean-going destroyers recently ordered to be built by contract for the Royal Navy are to have displacements varying from 775 tons to 810 tons. The Cossack, and Ghurka, which are being built respectively at the works of Messrs. Cammell, Laird, and Co., Birkenhead, and Messrs. Hawthorn, Leslie, and Co., Newcastle, are each to have a displacement of 810 tons, which is exactly the same displacement as that of the torpedo-gunboats of the Jason type, and 220 tons in excess of the largest destroyer now afloat. The Afridi, being built by Messrs. Armstrong, Mitchell, and Co., of Newcastle, will have a displacement of 795 tons, the Mohawk by Messrs. J. S. White, Cowes, 775 tons, and the Tartar by Messrs. Thornycroft and Co., 785 tons. The destroyers will be fitted with turbine machinery, but the power of their engines and their speed are not yet announced. It is reported that they will be capable of steaming 33 knots.

Colonel Gaedke, the military critic, appeared before a Berlin Court of Justice on Feb. 7th on the charge of illegally bearing the title of colonel. When he was in Manchuria Colonel Gaedke was condemned to the loss of his rank and title by a Court of Honour, an account of an article he had published with regard to the assassination of King Alexander of Serbia. The verdict of the Military Court was confirmed by the Emperor. Colonel Gaedke, however, on his return to Berlin, publicly defied the Minister of War to prevent him from using his title as colonel. The Court has now, however, adopted the view that Colonel Gaedke could not be deprived of his right to the title of colonel, and acquitted him.

Two members of the Aero Club, Messrs. C. F. Pollock and Martindale, successfully crossed the English Channel in a balloon on Feb. 3rd the noteworthy feature of the voyage, remarks a contemporary rather contradictorily, being the fact that much of it was accomplished in the face of a furious snowstorm. The start was made from the Wandsworth Gas Works at 12.15 p.m. and at 2 p.m. the voyagers passed directly over Eastbourne at a height of 3,700 ft. When about 30 miles across the Channel the balloon rose to a height of 7,000 ft., and entered a mass of dense cold cloud. Snow fell in large quantities. At 3.30 p.m. the coast of France was dimly seen through the cloud, and at 3.42 p.m. the aeronauts were again over land, the passage of the Channel—70 miles across—having been accomplished in one and three-quarter hours. When about 20 miles inland it was found that the ballast was running short, and it was decided to descend, which was safely accomplished.

Sir Edwin Cornwall, Chairman of the London County Council ought to have thoroughly enjoyed the trip recently made by that body to Paris. We read that "Sir Edwin Cornwall on Feb. 6th kissed the Market Queen, Mlle. Alvaret, at the Paris Central Market, and the Entente Municipale was finally cemented. Surrounded by a bevy of Maids of Honour, the Queen, as representative of the saleswomen of the market, stepped forward with a magnificent tricolour bouquet as the visitors from the London County Council drove up to the market from the Grand Hotel at eleven o'clock. The graceful act of courtesy was performed amid great enthusiasm. Sir Edwin stepped down from his carriage, accompanied by Dr. Brousse, president of the Paris Municipal Council, to receive the bouquet. Without hesitation, he walked briskly to the fresh-complexioned French girl and saluted her soundly on both cheeks, placing his hand paternally on her shoulders. Sir Edwin is not a man to leave a good deed half done, and the delight of the crowd culminated when he also kissed the buxom ladies of one of the market guilds, who also presented a bouquet. It was his duty and he did it, though subsequently Sir Edwin confessed that it was "a very pleasant duty." The London County Councillors visited various institutions in Paris yesterday, and the chairman aroused great enthusiasm by kissing a number of young girls.

WASTE SILK.
 A good demand, but business restricted by the absence of suitable qualities. Prices are unchanged, but if a buyer can put up with inferior fibre he can get some concession as to price. Quality up to standard would be worth good money.

Tokyo.—The embarrassment in the market seems to have reached a crisis on Friday, on which day the fall commenced. Mr. Matsutani, the leader of the speculators, who purchased nearly four hundred thousand koku during the past two weeks, was reported to be struggling to revive the market or to escape losses. With this view he began to sell in Yokohama. Meanwhile an agitation arose in the Exchange against the Directors as to the insufficient deposit of margin money by the speculative buyers and after warm disputes transactions were suspended.

Osaka and Kobe.—Being affected by the troubles and the fall in Tokyo, the markets of Osaka, Kobe and other western cities have begun to drop.

ticipated by $223,926. The liabilities at the close of the year amounted to $15,119,399.32 and the assets to $15,560,894.98, leaving a balance of $441,495.66.

THE Star of the Garter presented to the Mikado by Prince Arthur of Connaught, is similar to the one worn by the four Marquises of Hertford in succession, which was afterwards presented to Lord Beaconsfield. THE Kokumin says that the steamer Netherton arrived at Kobe on April 4th from Australia carrying three hundred thousand pounds of gold bullion. Probably a mistake has been made by our contemporary as to the weight, 300,000 lbs makes about 134 tons. It may be doubted whether such a quantity of gold bullion was really sent from the British colonies to Japan.

Since then she has devoted herself to raw silk manufacture.

CHINA.

Saturday, March 31.

The British Government has presented a Note to the Wai-wu-pu in connexion with the Nanchang trouble, calling for the opening of Wu Chin-tin for foreign trade and the payment of seven thousand taels for damage caused by the rioters. The Chinese Government is expected to concede these requests and at the same time to open another town in Kiangsi.

The armies under Viceroy Yuan Shi-kai and Chang Chi-tung will hold combined spring manoeuvres at Temu, in Hunan. About 105,000 soldiers will participate and the expenses are estimated at 2,400,000 taels.

Monday, April 2.

News from China is the effect that the Nanchang negotiations are not proceeding smoothly. The French demands are said to be these:—

- 1.—That the Chinese Authorities recognise that the Chihhsien was not killed by French priests.
- 2.—That an indemnity of 530,000 dollars be paid by China.
- 3.—That eight prominent Chinese who took part in the affair be executed.
- 4.—That a monument be set up to the murdered French padres.
- 5.—That the local officials who failed to protect the French shall be severely punished.

The Chinese Authorities are said to have shown themselves obdurate with respect to these proposals and the conference is represented as on the point of breaking up. But it is plain that such demands can not be called severe even by the most conservative Chinese politician, and indeed there is reason to think that Peking does not regard them as at all severe. The Chinese press, however, seems to be acting a very mischievous part. It is publishing articles of a most inflammatory nature, based mainly on the assumption that the death of the Chinese Magistrate is directly chargeable to a French priest, and that China's national dignity is concerned in resisting these demands. We have little doubt that the affair will end satisfactorily, but it is plain that a new factor has been introduced into all such negotiations by the existence of a vernacular press.

A telegram from London to the Jiji Shimpō says that when receiving the Chinese Commissioners the Emperor of Germany laid much stress on the necessity of China providing herself speedily with a competent army. His Majesty is represented as adding, however, that the army must be trained in a truly national spirit and that everything like excessive respect for or slavish imitation of the institutions of a foreign country must be avoided. We suspect this to be a garbled version of His Majesty's words. The latter part of the declaration would be an obvious and quite unnecessary reference to the influence Japan's example is exercising upon China; and in nine cases out of every ten it turns out upon investigation that these tactless and unnecessary statements which the telegraph is so fond of attributing to the Kaiser have their origin in the imagination of a reporter.

The military arsenal authorities of Hupeh have engaged two Japanese civil engineers and fifteen assistants to occupy places hitherto filled by Germans. The monthly salary of the engineers is fixed at five hundred dollars each and the assistants at between a hundred and two hundred dollars each.

The Prince of Turuhato, Outer Mongolia, left Turuhato for Japan on the 30th instant, for the purpose of prosecuting his studies in Japan.

A Peking dispatch states that yellowish snow has fallen for several days (the yellowness being of course due to dust in the air), exciting superstition among the Chinese. They recall the tradition that yellow rain fell at the time of the downfall of the Ming Dynasty. Wild rumours are prevailing, one of which states that several would-be assassins have recently found their way into the Imperial Palace.

According to a Harbin telegram some 60 per cent. of the Russian army are still stationed in Harbin, Kirin, Holonbail and Holan. The Russians are causing considerable interruption to the administration of the Chinese authorities.

Tuesday, April 3.

The restoration of peace does not appear to have brought any respite from the ravages of the Hunghutsz. They are said to be worse than ever in the regions adjacent to Kirin and Mukden. Probably the ranks of these freebooters were largely increased during the war and their difficulty in maintaining themselves is now proportionately great. But whatever be the explanation it is evident that the problem of protecting the peaceful inhabitants of Manchuria against such outrages will have to be very seriously taken up before long. Probably many Japanese subjects will settle in Manchuria, and it will be a ridiculous anomaly that a region virtually open throughout its length and breadth to foreign trade, travel and residence should be infested by brigands.

Wednesday, April 4.

Peking sends a singular telegram to the Hochi Shimbun. It is to the effect that the "Russian Railway Company"—we have never heard of such a company but presumably the East-China Railway Company is meant—has actually commenced operations for the construction of a line from Changchun to Kirin. The Company is said to pretext a concession obtained from the former Governor-General of Manchuria. It is not at all improbable that some effort to obtain such a concession was made, and we can well believe that it met with some semblance of success during the confusion that reigned in Manchuria throughout the war. But no one who recalls the circumstances and the language of the Portsmouth Convention and its accompanying diplomatic notes will be disposed to place the slightest credence in the Hochi telegram. Russia may be said to be textually bound not to make any essay to build a line from Changchun to Kirin, and China is morally bound not to allow the building of such a line by any foreign concessionaries unless they be Japanese. The story may therefore be regarded with much incredulity. The public must be prepared for a great many sensational tales as the aftermath of the great war. For example, the Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent wires that the Russians in the Amur region are still employing Chinese labourers to build defensive works, and inexplicable as such a procedure must seem, it is not dismissed by our contemporary as altogether chimerical. But one can easily understand how ill qualified rumour is to collect with any discrimination the materials for such a tale. The mere construction of a barrack enclosure might easily assume to unsophisticated eyes the aspect of a defensive work. It will be safe to assume that the Russians have at present no inclination whatever to invite fresh complications.

Thursday, April 5.

It will be fresh in the memories of our readers that Mr. Odagiri, who distinguished himself so much as Japanese Consul-General in Shanghai, recently resigned his official position for the purpose of accepting a position in the Osaka Shosen Kaisha. A telegram to the Jiji Shimpō from Peking states that the Governor-General of Mukden has reported to the Peking Government an essay on the part of Mr. Odagiri to establish a Japanese-Chinese bank in Mukden. Governor Chiao says that want of funds prevented the Chinese in Mukden from endorsing the proposal, but one finds some difficulty in crediting that explanation. The war did not impoverish Mukden and its neighbourhood. On the contrary, it brought large sums of money into the pockets of the Chinese, and it was doubtless in consideration of that fact that Mr. Odagiri made the proposal attributed to him.

Friday, April 6.

It is stated that wide divergence still exists between the views of the French Authorities and those of the Chinese with regard to the Nanchang affair. The Wai-wu-pu conceived the idea of asking England and America to mediate, but according to present appearances recourse will be had to the Hague Tribunal. The exact points of difference at this stage are not clearly stated, but it would seem that the Chinese are still disposed to attribute to the missionaries blame which the latter's representatives strenuously repudiate. Unquestionably a great deal of mischief has been done by intemperate writing in Chinese journals. These have caused so much excitement and probably disseminated such a false view of the situation that the Chinese Authorities, though only too anxious to effect a pacific settlement, find themselves hampered by an unwonted factor in the shape of public opinion. At the same time it appears beyond question that the case presents some features of a novel nature from the Chinese point of view.

MR. SCHIFF.

Distinguished American tourists have certainly been very unfortunate of late in Japan. Mr. Harriman's experience is only seven months' old and now an occurrence somewhat similar in its general features has to be recorded of Mr. Schiff. It appears that the Denkai Tetsudo Kaisha of Odawara has hitherto contributed a sum of money yearly to the festival of Hachiman, which is the great annual event in the village of Sakawa near Odawara. This year, however, for some unexplained reason, no contribution was made, and the omission created much ill-feeling among the people, which exhibited itself in frequent obstructions to the electric cars' passage, the festival dashi being drawn purposely across the track. On the forenoon of the 3rd as Mr. Schiff was passing in company with Mr. Kitajima of the Bank of Japan, the youthful element in the crowd, not content with obstructing the passage of the car, threw stones at it, and the police, when they interfered, were so roughly handled that two of them are now in hospital. The car carrying Mr. Schiff made its way through the crowd without serious mishap, but for a time there seems to have been a scene of great confusion. This is another opportunity for the sensational telegraphists. American newspapers will probably publish some highly ornamental paragraphs.

POLITICAL NOTES.

The parliamentary members of the Seiyun-kai met on the 31st ultimo, partly for the sake of electing new officers and partly to take leave of each other preparatory to returning to their provinces. Marquis Saionji made a brief address in his usual happy vein. He complimented the party on the spirit of combination and discipline they had shown in passing important measures through the Diet although they laboured under the disadvantage of having had to approach these questions at very short notice. Perhaps the most interesting part of his speech was a warning to politicians who allowed themselves to speak of Japan's position in Manchuria and Korea as presenting opportunities which were beyond her strength to utilize. His Excellency condemned such want of self-reliance in very strong terms and said that nothing good was ever accomplished by men who did not trust themselves.

According to Tokyo journals there seems to be some friction in the ranks of the Progressists. They consider that they made a great failure in the last session of the Diet, and a section of the Party—variously estimated at from 20 to 50 strong (the Kokumin Shimbun publishes the names of 56)—are said to insist that Count Okuma is to blame and that only his retirement, followed by re-organization, can restore the fortunes of the Party. Among these malcontents, however, we do not find the names of any men who can be justly regarded as leaders, and since the Progressists can not possibly find an abler or more influential leader than Count Okuma, the probability is that this temporary discontent will prove evanescent. The idea of men like Mr. Hiraoka Kotaro and Mr. Koizuka Ryo seems to be that a union should be cemented with the Seiko club and that the Progressists should become a Satsuma Party.

The two members of the Daido Club who created the bear-garden scene in the Lower House on the occasion of the discussion of the Peers' amendments to the Railway Bill were named Inoyori and Buto. They seem to have possessed the confidence of the Party up to that time, but naturally their resort to Sacki methods impaired their popularity. Thus whereas they were then included among the four leaders of the Daido Club in the Lower House, a subsequent re-organization of the Party threw them out of office altogether. From having been among the first four they did not find a place even among the committee of twenty-five which was now appointed, still less among the three members selected to fill the post of managing directors. It might have been anticipated that the Daido Club would expel them altogether from its ranks but such extreme measures are not resorted to in Japan except in even more extreme cases. Moyori and Buto, however, so far from being abashed by their own doings in connexion with the Railway Bill, seem to have bitterly resented the indirect reproof addressed to them in the Party's voting for the committee of 25, and their anger was specially directed against Mr. Nojiri, a particularly quiet and inoffensive man of 64, who, being much trusted by his fellow-politicians, was elected one of the three managing directors. On the 1st instant when Mr. Nojiri happened to be at the offices of the Party, he was fiercely attacked with a big stick by the man Moyori, and when he had effected his escape to the gate of the building he was seized by Buto and received a second beating. Rescued and carried home he instructed the police from his sick bed and Moyori and Buto were apprehended. Thereupon the Daido Club assembled and decided—not without opposition, strange as the fact may seem—that Nojiri should be asked to withdraw his prosecution of his assailants in consideration of the latter being invited to resign from the ranks of the Club, the alternative in the event of their refusal being expulsion. Messrs. Moyori and Buto are certainly the objects of very lenient treatment. A month at hard labour on prison fare would seem to be their more appropriate reward.

The trouble in the Daido Club has been amicably settled through the intervention of two committees appointed by the members, one having for function to urge upon Messrs. Moyori and Buto the expediency of resigning their membership of the Club; the other being commissioned to induce Mr. Nojiri to withdraw his prosecution of his two assailants. This withdrawal of a prosecution for criminal assault may perplex our readers, so it will be well to explain that in Japan there is always an interval between the arrest of a person criminally charged at private instance and the formulation of a complaint against him by the public procurator. During that interval the nature of the evidence against the accused is examined and further evidence, if there be any, is collected. If, before the prisoner is duly committed, his prosecutor withdraws the accusation, release follows. That is what has happened in the case of Messrs. Moyori and Buto. Mr. Nojiri, whom they so grievously maltreated, seems to be so loyal to his party that he at once accepted the latter's suggestion to let his ferocious assailants go scot-free. We wonder what will be the political future of Messrs. Moyori and Buto. Their career in that field would seem to be at an end, and a niche may still be found for them in the ranks of the Kono Hironaka coterie.

It is alleged by one of our Tokyo contemporaries that the Russian Government has lodged a protest through M. Korsakoff. In May, 1904, the Korean Government formally denounced its treaties and conventions with Russia. The latter raised no objection to this act at the time, but she is now said to have approached Japan with a declaration that such abolitions of international agreements can not be made by one of the contracting parties only but that both must give their consent. The protest would seem somewhat frivolous though if successful it would have the effect of conserving for Russia some of the concessions which contributed to precipitate the war. The reply attributed to the Korean Government is very simple. It is said to have been to the effect that a state of war existed at the time referred to in the protest, and Korea, having definitely allied herself with Japan, had become Russia's open enemy. Under these circumstances all treaties and conventions existing between the two countries naturally became dead letters, and so far from Korea's action in the matter being defective in routine, it may almost be said to have been superfluous.

Mr. Kono Hironaka and his three followers, representatives of the Tohoku district, have resigned from the Progressist ranks. Mr. Kono was originally a Liberal. He abandoned that party to join the Progressists, and now he abandons the Progressists to go out into the wilderness. It is not probable that his defection will be followed by any very marked results. He and his friends appear to belong to the section who clamour for the retirement of Count Okuma, thinking that some other politician might find a breach in the Seiyun-kai fortress and lead them safely to the assault.

The trouble among the Progressists seems to have subsided, though we find ourselves perplexed to describe the nature of the settlement. According to current accounts representatives of the reform section have conferred with Mr. Inukai, Dr. Hatoyama and other leaders of the conservative section and have received assurances that every effort will be made to carry out their suggestions after due investigation, but that nothing is immediately possible since the reformers are not clear as to their own intentions or desires. The formula "due investigation" has in Japan as elsewhere the force of indefinite postponement, and it may possibly be intended to have that force in the present case. But the malcontents are pacified and that is the main thing. No one appears to be disappointed except the small body of agitators whose main object was to fish in troubled waters.

It seems that one subject of complaint had reference to heavy expenditures on the building of offices. The complainants contend that the money might have been devoted more profitably to the general purposes of the Party.

KAMAKURA AND HOJO TOKIMUNE.

On April 4th a grand festival was held at the temple Engaku-ji in Kamakura for the purpose of celebrating the high honour paid last year to the memory of Hojo Tokimune, the Shikken of Kamakura. The policy of the Hojo family was not to hold the post of Shogun themselves: they always procured from Kyoto a prince to occupy that high title, but it is historical that if this prince's procedure displeased the Hojo rulers, he very quickly performed the return journey to the western capital. Tokimune, though he virtually ruled Japan, had no official rank higher than the second class of the fifth grade: in fact, were he alive now he would be reckoned among sonin officials. He it was that beat back the Mongol invasion: that is to say, he issued the orders and made the dispositions which ended in the complete discomfiture of the invaders, for he himself never left Kamakura, and a couplet current in military circles at the time said that the Mongol attack presented no feature so formidable as disobedience to the orders of Kamakura. Last year, during the height of the war with Russia, the Emperor conferred on Tokimune the posthumous title of second class of the first grade, thus raising him to the highest rank that a subject can attain. Yesterday's festival was, as the Japanese say, to convey information of this fact to the spirit of the deceased ruler, and it took place at Engaku-ji, because that temple was built by Tokimune, and because he, like all Japanese earnest followers of bushido, was a fervent believer in the doctrines of the Zen sect. Large numbers of military and naval officers and men attended the celebration. It had been Marquis Oyama's intention to be present but he was unavoidably prevented. A military band of 65 performers was despatched by the authorities, and the quiet glades of Engaku-ji echoed the notes of modern martial music for the first time.

VISIT OF PRINCE FERDINANDO.

The Italian cruiser Calabria, with His Royal Highness Prince Ferdinand of Udino, arrived at Yokohama at 6.50 p.m. on March 29th. Captain Murakami, I.J.N., and Mr. Fukuba, Master of Ceremonies, who were appointed by His Majesty the Emperor to welcome the Italian Prince, Count G. C. Vinci-Gigliucci, Italian Minister, and Staff, the Chev. Luigi Casati, of the Italian Consulate, Yokohama; Governor Sufu and other officials of Kanagawa Kencho, and Mayor Ichihara, at once proceeded to the Calabria to welcome His Royal Highness.

This warship left Italy in March last. After cruising off the coasts of Central and South America, she reached San Francisco and then proceeded to Australia via Honolulu, after which she came on to Manila. The Prince, having received an invitation from His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, the Calabria left Manila on March 21st for Japan. When she was off Honmoku, twenty-one fire-works were discharged from the compound of the Customs, and the cruiser Akashi fired a salute. An arch with the Japanese and Italian flags combined was erected at the entrance to the West Hatoba but owing to the rainy weather His Royal Highness did not land as expected. He will proceed to Tokyo on April 1st and put up at the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace.

Count G. C. Vinci-Gigliucci, Italian Minister, will give a banquet at 7.30 p.m. on April 4th at his Legation in honour of the Prince, inviting Japanese princes and princesses of the Blood, and high officials, and all the foreign representatives and their wives and daughters. The dinner will be followed by a ball.

All the Japanese newspapers congratulate his Royal Highness on his safe arrival and give utterance to expressions of cordial welcome.

His Royal Highness landed from the cruiser Calabria at 2 p.m., on Sunday. At the West Hatoba he was received by the Imperial Reception Committee, a number of officials of the Imperial Household, and other Japanese and Italian notables. At 2.15 p.m., he left for Tokyo by special train.

At 3.12 p.m. His Highness arrived at Shimbashi where Japanese and foreign officials welcomed him on the platform. He at once proceeded to the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace.

A little before noon to-day, April 2nd, he will proceed to the Imperial Palace and will have audience of the Emperor and be entertained by His Majesty at luncheon.

Prince Ferdinand's visit to Tokyo is producing the usual routine of audiences, receptions, banquets and Orders. The Emperor has conferred on his Royal Highness the Grand Cordon of the Chrysanthemum and decorations of lesser distinction have been bestowed on the members of his suite. Marquis Saionji has given a banquet in his honour and Marquis and Marchioness Nabeshima are to hold a reception this evening. The Prince's visit assumes somewhat the nature of an anti-climax to the visit of Prince Arthur of Connaught, but it is evident that Japanese hospitality must share the expansion decreed for all things by the war.

At 7.30 p.m., on April 1st His Royal Highness was entertained by His Imperial Highness Prince Fushimi, at the latter's mansion.

A little before noon on April 2nd the Italian Prince was received by the Emperor in the Phoenix Hall of the Imperial Palace and subsequently was entertained by His Majesty in the Homei Hall. At the luncheon, Prince Fushimi, Prince and Princess Arisugawa, Prince and Princess Nashimoto, Prince and Princess Fushimi, the younger; the Ministers of State; Count G. C. Vinci-Gigliucci, Italian Minister; and high officials of the Imperial Household were present. The same evening, Prince Arisugawa entertained the Italian Prince at the former's residence.

On the evening of the 3rd instant the Prince attended a meeting of the Italian Society which has Prince Arisugawa for President. Marquis Nabeshima presided. In a brief speech he welcomed the Prince, assuring him that the visits paid to Japan by his father, the Duke of Genoa, were well remembered, and expressing the honour the Society felt in His Highness's presence. He begged the Prince to accept the badge of the Society which had been struck in gold for the purpose. Prince Ferdinand, in replying, declared that he shared all his father's admiration for and sympathy with the Japanese, that he hoped for the fulfillment of their high aims and that he would regard the badge presented to him by the society as the most valuable memento of his visit to Japan.

On the morning of April 4th, the Prince will leave for Yokosuka and will be entertained by Admiral Namimura, Commander of the Naval Station. Returning to Tokyo the same evening, the Prince will be entertained by Admiral Saito, Minister for the Navy, at the latter's official residence.

On April 4th, Prince Ferdinand of Udino proceeded to the Yokosuka Naval Station, leaving Shimbashi at 8.20 a.m. After paying a visit to the forts, His Highness was entertained at luncheon by Admiral Kamimura, Commander-in-chief. Subsequently he paid a visit to some captured warships which are undergoing repairs, after which he returned to Shimbashi.

The ball held on the evening of April 4th at the Italian Legation in honour of Prince Ferdinand was highly successful. About two hundred and fifty distinguished people were present, including Princes and Princesses of the Blood; the Ministers of State; the foreign Chefs de Mission and their staffs; Marquises Oyama and Yamagata; and several high officials of the Foreign Office and Imperial Household.

DEATH OF MR. A. T. KNAPP.

We regret to announce the death, under the saddest circumstances, of Mr. A. T. Knapp, only son of Mr. A. M. Knapp, proprietor of the Japan Daily Advertiser. Mr. Knapp's body was found in the Creek about 7 a.m. on Wednesday near the Kamenohashi at the foot of Jizo-zaka. Letters and papers were taken by the police as evidences of identity and later the body was identified by a member of the Advertiser's staff. It is believed that the deceased gentleman stumbled into the Creek during an attack of vertigo. Death is supposed to have taken place at least 24 hours before the body was found. The deepest sympathy will be extended to his parents, for in him they have lost a wonderfully gifted son, a man who for intellectual brilliancy and musicianly ability had few equals among the men of his time. As to his personal charm those who knew him readily confess that it was unique.

THE CRISIS IN NATAL.

When the last mail left England the authorities were not inclined to take a very serious view of the native troubles in Natal. Indeed, Col. Sir Albert Hime, the ex-Premier of the Colony, was disposed to consider the murder of the policemen sent to quell a hut-tax riot as merely a small local rising. In the course of an interview he remarked:—

There is no general discontent among the natives of Natal, nor has there been the slightest hostility to the hut tax, which during the 29 years I have known the colony has always been paid exceedingly well. Moreover, men who pay the hut tax do not have to pay the poll tax, which affects more particularly the young bloods who have not kraals of their own. The more sober heads of the kraals exercise a very wise checking influence on these young men. The natives in Natal are much too loyal to dream of rising against the Government. Even among the Europeans there was a certain amount of opposition to the imposition of the poll tax, which was objected to as a mere temporary tax for raising revenue. In fact the Government itself was not in favour of levying this poll tax till it was found that the other measures of taxation were thrown out.

Dealing with the military forces available in Natal, Sir Albert Hime said:—"Having regard to South Africa generally, there is no reason why Imperial troops should not be kept in Natal. It will not cost the Imperial Government any more to keep a regiment or two in Natal than in the Transvaal. In fact the cost in Natal would probably be less. As far as Natal is concerned, there are only about 200 Imperial troops in the colony, but the Militia, who number over 3,000, can be called out at a moment's notice, and there are also about 500 mounted police. I think there is sufficient force in the country, because there cannot be anything like an organized attempt at revolution. When there is a scare, as there seems to be at present, or even a prospect of native resistance, it would seem to be just as well that there should be regular Imperial soldiers in the colony as an emblem of the strength of the King's Government. I always thought it unwise to withdraw his Majesty's troops altogether from the colony, for the moral influence of even a handful would be very great."

In conclusion Sir Albert Hime referred to the Ethiopian movement as follows:—

Probably the connexion of the Ethiopian Church in the general question of a native rising is exaggerated, but at the same time this body is not one which will bring benefit to any Government in South Africa and ought to be most carefully watched. The attitude of the Natal Government with regard to them is that we would like to get them out of the colony altogether, but meanwhile we watch their movements with the greatest care. At any rate the Ethiopian Church has not secured any hold on the people of Natal worth mentioning. In the Cape Colony, however, it exercises the greatest influence, this being due to the fact that a section of the Ethiopian Church has been recognized by the Church of the Province of South Africa in the Cape Colony. That this is a dangerous movement is clear from the facts that have come to the knowledge of the Government.

Since these views were expressed the situation changed for the worse in the opinion of the Home Government, for Lord Elgin gave it as his opinion that he was justified in suspending the sentences of death passed upon the Zulu murderers in view of a possible native rising, and Imperial troops being required to deal with it. Within twenty-four hours of taking this stand the Government, frightened by the uproar it had caused in Natal, "backed down," acknowledged that it had no right to meddle with the domestic affairs of a self-governing Colony, and weakly apologised. Even the Daily News, its warmest supporter, had to acknowledge that a big blunder had been made by the new-fledged Ministry. The Cabinet has started badly.

THE MANCHURIAN RAILWAYS.

Our readers are aware that a council under the presidency of General Baron Kodama is sitting in Tokyo for the purpose of considering the undertakings that Japan has to take in hand in Manchuria. We learn from the Asahi that this Council has arrived at various interesting decisions. Thus the section of the East China Railway in Japanese hands is to be re-constructed, ~~not on the Russian gauge but on the same gauge as the other railways in China.~~ The line is to be put in a state of full repairs as a matter of course, but that entails something more than is suggested by the mere statement, for it appears that the Russians virtually destroyed the whole road from Changtu to Changchun at the time of their retreat, demolishing the bridges, removing the rails and tearing up the bed. This part of the road must therefore be re-constructed.

The next point refers to the Hsinmintun-Mukden line. It will be remembered that the Russians laid a military road between these two points, and that the Japanese captured it at the time of General Nogai's great flanking movement. A military line is a very rudimentary affair at best and the probability is that the Japanese did not reap much material benefit from this particular capture. At all events, the line being necessary to their strategic plans, they soon restored it to working order, and the Peace of Portsmouth found them running military trains between Mukden and Hsinmintun, which, as our readers know, are the two points—distant 17 miles—which remain to be linked up in order to bring the East China road into connexion with the Chinese railway system to Peking. It seemed a natural thing that the Japanese, being in actual possession of the section and daily running trains over it, would receive from China a concession to build a permanent line, but according to the published accounts of the Peking Conference, China objected on the ground that this road leads to the mausolea of the Tsing Emperors, and Japan, recognizing the plea, abandoned her pretensions. But the Asahi now tells a different story. It says that an agreement was made in the sense that China and Japan are to construct the line jointly, each paying one half of the expense, and are to run it in combination for a space of 18 years, after which China will have the option of repurchasing Japan's share. The experts employed for construction and operation are to be mainly Japanese. That is the Asahi's account, and it adds that the line is to be security to Japan during the interval of 18 years. Our contemporary tells also a story which puts a new complexion on the affair of the Changchun-Kirin line. This road was mentioned in the note appended to the Portsmouth Treaty in the sense that, so far as Russia was concerned, Japan should have the concession for the road. But when the Peking conference came to sit, the public learned that China denied having granted any concession to Russia for the line, and claiming an entirely free hand with regard to it, declared her intention of building it herself. As to this, however, we now learn from the Asahi that an arrangement has been effected similar to that described above in the case of the Hsinmintun-Mukden road. That is to say, each Power is to pay one-half of the cost of construction; the construction and operation are to be mainly by Japanese; the joint ownership is to last for a period of 25 years, and at the conclusion of that time China is to have the option of purchase, the line remaining as security during the interval. It may be mentioned here that the telegram alluded to in our last issue as to the Russians having commenced to build this line, is regarded in well-informed quarters as quite untrustworthy, its probable basis—if it has any basis at all—being some operation of survey by the Russians.

Of course, if the above accounts be true they put a greatly altered complexion on Japan's position in Manchuria with regard to railways. It will be remembered that when the terms of the Peking Peace Treaty were published and when the then habitual mood of Japanese discontent had received a fresh access from the news, some vague whispers were heard that the arrangements with regard to the Mukden-Hsinmintun and the Changchun-Kirin lines would ultimately be found more favourable than these conventional versions indicated. Possibly the details now given by the Asahi represent the quod restat then obscurely alluded to.

As to funds for these various railway undertakings, it is roughly calculated that to convert into a permanent way the military line now running between Antung and Mukden will involve an outlay of something like 120,000 or 130,000 yen per mile, the total cost being 25 millions and that a similar total, approximately, will be needed for the sundry other works detailed above. Whence this aggregate of 50 million yen is to be obtained by the Government no hint has yet been given, but the Asahi undertakes, at all events, to deny the rumour that the money due by Russia on account of the maintenance of her prisoners is to be devoted in part or in whole to the purpose.

KOREA.

Korea, through the Resident-General, has borrowed a sum of ten million yen from the Kogyo Ginko. One half of the amount is to be paid over at once and will be applied to four purposes, namely, education, public works, investigations and police. As to education, the plan, apparently, is to assist the Middle Schools and extend the subsidiary. As to public works, the establishment of an Agricultural and Commercial Bank is spoken of, with a capital of 800,000 yen, 500,000 of which will be supplied from the loan and 300,000 subscribed by the people. Then there are to be appropriations for road-building and also for water-works at Chemulpo. Further a large extension is to be made of the system of police stations and judicial tribunals, so that life and property may be rendered more secure and justice made more accessible. Finally a sum is to be set apart for taking a census. All these things are substantial steps of progress which will confer material benefit on the nation. Marquis Ito had one advantage when he took the reins of Korean affairs in hand: the country was without a foreign debt.

We read that the Korean Ladies' Society has elected Lady Om of the Imperial Palace as its president.

The Jiji has a telegram from Seoul to the effect that some Buddhist priests (Japanese) belonging to the Jodo section and various Koreans, members of the Hoi Chin-hoi party in South Chyolla-do have strenuously endeavoured to convert the natives to their religion, and collected money from them. Trouble has arisen between the priests and the natives over the collection of the money.

Madame Li Ha-yang, wife of the Korean Minister for Justice, left Seoul on April 1st for Japan.

News comes from Korea that the Advisory Bureau of the Residency-General has moved Marquis Ito to issue orders for dealing with a British Missionary—whose name is given as Mr. McCreagh. This gentleman is said to have behaved in a lawless manner, not only in affording undue protection to converts and in obstructing requisitions, but also in treating non-converts with lawless severity as well as in other matters. The story comes through the usual telegraphic channels and may prove largely exaggerated if not entirely groundless.

A body of regulations numbering 16 have been issued by the Residency-General in Seoul for the better control of Japanese subjects travelling or residing in Korea. We have only the vaguest information as yet concerning the nature of these regulations, but they are said to bear a close resemblance to the Yokai-rei of Japan; that is to say, the Premonition Regulations which entitle the Authorities to order, among other things, that any Japanese subjects whose presence in a particular region or whose procedure there seems likely to be injurious to peace or good order, shall withdraw forthwith. If this analogy be correct it will follow that the Japanese authorities will be vested with competence to deport from Korea, or, in circumstances of less moment, to remove from the interior, any of their nationals whose sojourn or travel is considered detrimental to Korean lawful interests. The Yokai-rei were bitterly denounced in Japan at the time of their promulgation. They were then regarded as a purely political weapon, nor can it be denied that they were directed mainly against political agitators. It will be interesting to learn what kind of criticism they evoke when applied to the case of Japanese subjects in Korea.

As a result of Marquis Ito's intervention Prince Wi-hwa, son of the Emperor of Korea, has ceased to be a fugitive and has at length been allowed to return to Seoul. The Prince resided some time in this country and also in America. If rumour be credible, his banishment from Korea did not at all interfere with his enjoyments abroad.

It will be remembered that ex-Prime Minister Chin Sang-heung has been for some time under arrest on suspicion of having instigated the attempt upon the life of Li Keung-thaik, Minister of War, who has just emerged from hospital, having barely recovered from the effects of the 17 wounds inflicted on him. A telegram from Seoul now says that the ex-Prime Minister has been sentenced to 3 years' transportation, which according to Korean procedure, means the payment of a fine. It must therefore be assumed that the charge against him was proved in part at all events.

Mr. D. W. Stevens, whose office as adviser in Foreign Affairs to the Korean Government was expected by some publicists to terminate naturally on the abolition of the Korean Foreign Office, has been re-appointed to a similar post in the Korean Affairs Bureau.

It is stated that a decision has been arrived at to establish the head-quarters of the Japanese troops in Korea at Yongsan and that a large factory will be built there—presumably an arsenal.

The captured ship Quandam (1431 gross tons) has been renamed Kuannan Maru and assigned to the Saseho Naval Station. This French vessel it may be remembered, was captured by the converted cruiser Bingo Maru in the neighbourhood of the Pescadores, Formosa, before the battle of the Japan Sea while reconnoitring the Japanese naval movements on behalf of the Russians.

TWENTY-SECOND SESSION OF THE DIET.

In a thoughtful article on the above subject the Asahi Shimbun says that on the whole the country may congratulate itself on the manner in which the business of legislation has been carried on in the two Houses during the session that has now closed. The session was to a certain extent lit up by the remaining rays of the orb of Japan's war-day, and much of the legislation carried on was connected with necessary post-bellum measures. To political parties the session will no doubt seem to have been disappointing, as it showed how far off they are from pre-eminence in the State. But we are pleased, continues the Asahi, to note the fact that there have been no signs of the practice of corruption among the parties during this session. This is a gratifying contrast to the state of affairs in the Lower House at the close of the China-Japan war. With one unfortunate exception the discussions in both Houses were carried on in a calm and rational manner. The outburst of feeling which marked the closing hour of the Session in the Lower House was a surprise to the general public. Though it is true that certain members are habitually given to the use of impolite language when attacking their opponents, an appeal to force such as took place on the last night of the session has happily been of rare occurrence in this country. What brought it about was the action of the President of the House in dealing with the amended Railway Bill. He felt obliged by the shortness of the time at the disposal of the House to dispense with discussion. This was interpreted by the opponents of the Bill to be an attempt on the part of the Seiyu-kai who had a majority to trample on the rights of the minority. It was most unfortunate, says the Asahi, that no opportunity could be given to the Opposition members to criticise the amended Bill. This was a result of the Government's practice of closing the Diet when the 3 months' period specified in the Constitution is up, despite the fact that it has the power to prolong the session for another week or two if it is so disposed. The Asahi thinks that the strictness with which the Government observes the 3 months' period is responsible for several abuses that now disfigure the legislature. It frequently happens that towards the end of the session Bills have to be rushed through the Houses without allowing proper time for discussion. And one device to which members have often resorted in the case of a Bill of which they disapprove is to postpone its consideration till the very end of the session so that there may not be time to deal with it. The business of the Houses has considerably increased in recent years and hence there is no reason why the Government should not exercise the right vested in it of extending the session for a few weeks.

The question which many people are asking now that the Diet has risen is, what will be the fate of the Saionji Cabinet? The Cabinet has not yet shown itself capable of standing unproped, says the Asahi. In the Houses it has been supported by the Seiyu-kai members. Outside the Diet it leans heavily on the Yamagata faction. Will the Seiyu-kai members of the Lower House still continue to follow the lead of the Marquis despite his inability, owing to circumstances which are beyond his control, to reward them with office? The opposition to the Cabinet in the Upper House is somewhat formidable to-day, as was shown by the trenchant manner in which that house dealt with the Railway Bill and by the unsparing way in which it revised or threw out other Bills. Will its attitude change before the next session of the Diet in favour of the present Cabinet? This seems very doubtful, concludes the Asahi. The record of the Lower House for the session shows that 72 Bills were introduced by the Government, 70 of which passed, one being thrown out and one was postponed. Out of 40 Private Bills, 24 passed, 9 were outvoted, 2 were quashed and 5 were postponed.

The revision of the Railway Bill seems to have been welcomed by the Press generally. It is pointed out that the experiment of the Government involves fewer risks now that it can only purchase about half the lines. Competition between State Railways and Private Lines will go on as heretofore and the Government's outlay on behalf of the lines to be purchased will be sensibly diminished. The principle of the State Monopoly of the country's lines which formed a leading feature of the original Bill was rendered null and void by the revision the Bill underwent in the Upper House.

A RECIPROCAL TARIFF BETWEEN JAPAN AND AMERICA.

A very sensible article on this subject appeared in the editorial columns of the Tokyo Asahi Shimbun a few days ago, the substance of which we proceed to give:—It is anticipated by business men that during the next few years Japan's trade with China and America especially ought to be developed as rapidly as possible. Our commercial relations with the latter country have for a long time past been in an unsatisfactory condition. Goods sent by us to America are unmercifully taxed there. We retaliate only to a limited extent. A readjustment of the tariff between the two countries in as far as it concerns the principal imports of each country, would, we should say, be welcomed by both countries. The Economic Society, which has been investigating this subject, is of opinion that the reduction in the import taxes of each country should for the present be limited to specified productions. We should be prepared to abolish the 25 per cent. ad valorem tax on American wheat and flour in return for a big reduction on the very heavy taxes levied on our manufactured silks (habutae principally) and figured matting—about 60 per cent on the former and 37 on the latter. There is not the slightest doubt in our minds as to the benefits to be derived by both countries from such a change in the tariff and we are hopeful that one of the results of Viscount Aoki's appointment to Washington will be the revision of a tariff which for a long time past has hindered our trade with America. The importation of American wheat and flour has been growing at a rapid rate in recent years, apart altogether from the abnormal demand for these commodities during the war. In 1898 the flour imported from America was valued at 1,332,675 yen; in 1903 it was 10,103,676 yen, and last year it was 9,633,549 yen. Wheat rose from 14,697 yen in 1898 to 2,825,699 yen in 1903; and to 13,062,369 yen in 1905. Now, since it was decided by the Diet in its last session that the 25 per cent. ad valorem tax on imported wheat and flour should be made a permanent tax, there is not the slightest doubt that the farmers of America would welcome the change proposed above. They have probably lived in hopes of the abolition of the extra war tax on food stuffs. But now that hope has gone they will agitate for a revision of the national tariff.

The agriculturists of Western America are largely dependent on their trade with China and Japan. They cannot compete with the Eastern states in sending produce to Europe. The long land journey to the Atlantic coast reduces the margin of profits very considerably. The abolition of the tax on American wheat and flour would mean an annual loss of revenue to us of over 2 million yen, but this could be made up for by America's reducing her tax on our manufactured silks and matting to a comparatively low figure. Americans would hardly be content to let these articles be imported free, as that would be a more generous bargain than the existing respective rates call for. But importers of the above-named articles after paying, say, half of the present tax would be able to realize sufficient profits to repay us for the loss of revenue. We have a Commercial Alliance with America (Nichi-Bei Shōgyō Domei) but hitherto it has effected nothing substantial for the benefit of either country. It might well begin its labours by trying to effect the establishment of a reciprocal tariff between the two countries.

The arrangement proposed by the Asahi Shimbun would doubtless please business men here and in America, but we fail to see how the Japanese Government and the American Government are going to make up for the loss of revenue involved in the proposed change unless it be by the imposition of fresh taxes. If the tariff were revised as suggested, money would flow into the coffers of business men, but that from an official point of view would not make up for a big loss of revenue. The change proposed would mean the readjustment of other taxes. But even so, it seems to us highly desirable as a means of developing the trade between the two countries concerned. It is said that Viscount Aoki is going to Washington with the determination to do his best to place the commercial relations of Japan and America on a better basis than that on which they now rest.

THE SAGHALIEN FISHING QUESTION.

As the fishing season approaches the interest increases in the question of the Saghalien privileges. Briefly stated the problem is that certain Russian subjects are holders of long-term fishing leases along that part of the coast of Saghalien which has been added to the Japanese dominions, and the Russian authorities are urging that these leases should be protected just as an ordinary right of property would be. But it appears to be contended in Japan that fishing privileges do not belong to the category of normal rights of property, and that the Saghalien waters having fallen into Japanese possession, the leases held there by Russian subjects under Russian authority, which has ceased to exist, can not be recognised as possessing any further validity. Rumour says that the question, having been submitted to the Privy Council in Tokyo, was by that body decided in a sense unfavourable to the Russian claims. These, however, are being pressed, and it is possible that the problem may be complicated by the reflection that Russia has it in her power to retaliate in kind when the time comes for giving practical effect to the privileges she has conventionally pledged herself to extend to Japanese subjects in her own waters. Meanwhile the Japanese fishermen whose interests are engaged have petitioned the Tokyo Authorities against recognizing Russia's claims.

THE RUSSIAN WITHDRAWAL.

Monday, April 2.

The original forecast was that the withdrawal of the Japanese troops from Manchuria would be effected by the middle of April, but in fact it was completed by the 26th of March, excepting, of course, the four divisions left to garrison Manchuria and Korea. Doubtless there will be a corresponding diminution in the estimated outlays. What was the total force of Japanese sent across the seas, combatant and non-combatant? The Asahi Shimbun says 1,150,000 of all arms.

The Treaty of Peace was ratified on the 14th of October, 1905. Consequently the Japanese took exactly 162 days to effect withdrawal.

Tuesday, April 3.

The tardiness shown by the Russians in withdrawing their troops from Manchuria is beginning to excite comment. A hundred and sixty-two days have sufficed for Japan to carry home over a million men, but the bulk of the Russian army seems to be still massed about Harbin, and it begins to be very doubtful whether the period of 18 months fixed by the Portsmouth Treaty will suffice to repatriate the great force of men still in northern Manchuria. Suggestions are thrown out that since Grodtkoff relieved Linevitch of the Command-in-Chief the homeward movement of the men has been notably arrested, and from that version of the facts it is an easy step to the suspicion that the new General is adopting the man-at-the-front policy hitherto assigned to him by rumour, and that instead of withdrawing the Russian Army he contemplates making it an instrument of fresh aggression. The period of 18 months will expire on the 14th of April, 1907. Hence there is more than a full year to run still. Much may be done in a year, and, for our own part, we find great difficulty in believing that anything like bad faith is contemplated by either the Russian Government or Russian military officials towards Japan in this matter. There is quite enough in the state of Russia's internal affairs to account for her seeming tardiness in withdrawing her forces.

Wednesday, April 4.

The somewhat sensational rumours published on the 2nd instant as to Russia having virtually suspended the withdrawal of her troops from Northern Manchuria and General Grodtkoff being bent upon a policy of aggression, are greatly modified if not altogether corrected this morning. Thus the Fiji points out that the state of the circum-Baikal Railway as well as of the trans-Baikal transport service is such as to render it impossible for Russia to carry her troops home with anything like expedition, and thus the delay now taking place must be regarded as inevitable. Operations of military transport in the Harbin-Baikal regions are largely affairs of season. When the spring fairly sets in, much greater celerity will doubtless mark Russia's movements. She must be feeling the financial strain so acutely that every day's delay in repatriating her Asian army is irksome.

KIAOCHOU.

A Japanese Professor of Agriculture, Mr. Menju, who has spent 5 years at Kiaochow, denies that Germany has any idea of abandoning the place. She has resolved, however, to give up the idea of making it a military station, and will garrison it henceforth with marines. The barracks at Kaumih are to be handed over to the Chinese, who will use them for school purposes—Kaumih is the most advanced point thus far reached by the line to the capital of Shantung—and altogether the place will be divested of all its original character of imperial ambition.

The Vorwärts, the Social-Democratic organ, reckons that the cost of Kiaochow has already exceeded £6,000,000. The Frankfurter Zeitung comes to the conclusion in a long article, written evidently by an expert, that Germany would do well to restore the Protectorate to China on payment by the latter of all the outlay made by Germany. The article says that Kiaochow is not worth the vast sums of money spent upon it, and that it is gross exaggeration to declare Tsingtau to be the finest harbour in the Far East, for Germany could take the place, as it was not good enough for any other Power. Attention is drawn to the official reports on Kiaochow, which show that the rapid increase in trade has been due to the Japanese, while German trade has stood still. German traders and engineers in Tsingtau view the future of the colony with dejection. As so many of these Germans are Government officials of some kind or other, they conceal their gloomy views in public, but in private life the prospect has been discussed openly. Tsingtau has been converted into a charming town of officialism. The journal referred to concludes that, in view of the new state of matters in the Far East, Kiaochow has become entirely valueless to Germany: "Not even as a naval station is it of any use, for the Far Eastern Fleet would be quite cut off from Germany in time of war, and be exposed to the enemy. It would cost at least £3,000,000 to make Tsingtau into a fortified place, and after all Kiaochow must become the property of China or Japan. Thus, it were better for Germany to withdraw from the colony with all possible speed."

THE S. P. G.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel at its annual meeting held in London during February received some interesting correspondence concerning the proposed erection of some new bishoprics in the Far East. The Secretary in the course of his report said that the Bishop of Singapore, Labuan, and Sarawak desired to see Singapore and the Straits Settlements made into an independent diocese, leaving him to continue his work in Borneo. The endowment of the present diocese was collected for Borneo, Singapore being afterwards added to it. Now that Singapore had grown into great importance, it must raise its endowments for its own see. Equally interesting was the question of a Bishopric for Manchuria. The Bishop of North China, in concert with his clergy, had recommended the creation of this new diocese, pending the opinion of the Nippon Sei Kokwai (Japan Church). Nothing, they wrote, should be done in Manchuria without the advice of the Church in Japan, and of course in Korea as well. In Shantung Bishop Iliff proposed to build without delay a theological college for the training of his catechists and pastors. He was not, sure, however, whether the college should be at Chi-fu or in the interior. Bishop Awdry wrote on many important subjects from Tokyo. An impressive Christian service was held there in memory of the dead in the war who came from Tokyo. They had also had meetings in regard to the future of the Chinese students who had been at the Tokyo University, and were now returning to China. Delegates from Churchmen in China had been conferring on the question with the Bishops in Tokyo. A movement was on foot to send evidences to the people of India from Japan, pointing out that the faith of the Gospel had had much to do with the wonderful progress of Japan in these days.

Regarding the finances of the venerable Society, the Secretary reported that the income had reached £191,957. Legacies and special funds had been largely increased while the general fund of the Society showed in 1905 distinct signs of elasticity. It was true that the total subscriptions for 1905 only exceeded that of 1904 by £234; but in 1904 a very urgent and personal appeal was made for the general fund, which produced £4,780. In 1905 no such appeal was made, but a rise in ideals and earnestness raised the total obtained in small sums. The larger donations were not more numerous in 1905 than in 1904.

THE RAILWAY BILL.

The following is the Government estimate of the values of the seventeen private railways which are to be nationalized:—

Hokkaido Colliery.....	29,168,180
Hokkaido .....	10,924,788
Nippon .....	130,532,540
Ganyetsu .....	1,955,898
Hokuyetsu .....	7,133,961
Kobu .....	9,729,020
Sobu .....	10,326,480
Boso .....	1,921,521
Nanao .....	1,430,376
Kwansei .....	31,208,060
Nishinari .....	1,259,992
Sangu .....	3,773,840
Kyoto .....	2,763,470
Hankaku .....	6,351,927
Sanyo .....	74,042,980
Tokushima .....	1,235,322
Kyushu .....	97,654,600

It is now stated that the cost of the 17 lines which the Railway Nationalization Bill pledges the Government to buy is 421,513,356 yen, not 442,743,319 yen, as originally stated, and that it will be paid off in 33 years instead of 40. We are inclined to doubt the latter statement, at all events. The time indicated in the first place by the Government was 45 years, and there is as yet nothing to show that this estimate is incorrect.

According to the Official Gazette the railways to be purchased are as follow:—

The Hokkaido Tanko	The Nanao Railway.
Tetsudo.	The Kwansei Railway.
The Hokkaido Railway.	The Sangu Railway.
The Nippon Railway.	The Kyoto Railway.
The Gan-yetsu Railway.	The Nishi-nari Railway.
The Hoku-yetsu Railway.	The Han-kaku Railway.
The Ko-bu Railway.	The San-yo Railway.
The So-bu Railway.	The Tokushima Railway.
The Bo-so Railway.	The Kyushu Railway.

THE PLAGUE.

According to an official telegram, the case of plague in Kobe which was reported in our last issue is Dr. Sasayama of the Fukiai Hospital, Higashiyama. On April 2nd a new case of the same disease was reported in Kobe, the patient being a youth named Yoshihiro, residing in Kotonoo-machi.

A Shimonoseki telegram says that on April 2nd a case of plague was reported in that city.

The Governor of Formosa wired on March 31st to the Central Government that one case of plague had appeared at Taipeh, four in Toroku and three in Kagi. The patients since the first outbreak this year number 294.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

An earnest cry of warning is raised in the Quarterly Review against the reckless extravagance with which the British Government is carried on, and the very serious increase of taxation. The average householder, we are told, is overtaxed, and the machinery of government is too heavy and too costly for the practical requirements of the country; meanwhile the army is not in a condition of effective equipment, and all the big cities of the land are staggering under enormous loads of debt, of which they have no prospect of being relieved. Says the anonymous writer:—

"The average householder, called upon to meet what appear to be insatiable demands for taxes and rates, asks whether he obtains the value for money. He has only dim perceptions of how it is disbursed. He abandons as hopeless all attempts to understand the mysteries of administration or to fathom the bottomless pit of expenditure. He reads in the daily papers of millions being voted by a handful of members in the House of Commons in a few minutes, and with little or no discussion, for purposes said to be imperative. He may take a casual glance at one of the plethoric blue-books issued by the ton every year; but the details are bewildering, and the columns of figures repellent. He sees gigantic edifices arising in Whitehall, and is told that they are intended to accommodate hundreds of clerks in some branch of Dickens's 'circumlocution office.' He is confronted all over the country by palatial structures known as town-halls, municipal buildings, asylums, hospitals, union-houses, infirmaries, pauper village-schools, and public buildings of various kinds. Their origin, methods of work, and the practical results, are beyond his comprehension. But the unpleasant facts remain that he is paying a war income-tax of a shilling in the pound in a time of peace; that he is assessed for house-duty at eightpence on his rack-rental in addition to a shilling in the pound as property-tax if he happens to own his house; that the indirect imposts on tea and other necessities are irritating; and that, taking the country as a whole, his local rates have increased fifty per cent. in twenty years, and show no signs of abatement. Less than a generation ago, rates and taxes were about one-sixth of the rent, except in villages, where the proportion was less; they now average nearly one-half the rental, and they threaten to equal it in amount."

Nor is there any adequate return for this expenditure. This is proved, for instance, by the present condition of the army, for which vast sums are voted every year. He cites the speech of Earl Roberts as follows:

"Speaking in the House of Lords last July, and at various public functions, Earl Roberts declared that our military forces are not in a position to do the work expected of them. He said that the Boer war had shown the grave imperfections of the military machine, but that nothing had been done to rectify them since the conclusion of peace. Except that the officers and men have had experience of actual warfare, we are as unprepared as we notoriously were in 1899. With the remedies for this condition of things, as suggested by Earl Roberts, the present article is not concerned. The immediate point is that, notwithstanding the enormous and constantly increasing outlay on our military forces, they are proclaimed, on the highest authority, to be inadequate and inefficient."

The country is impoverished, moreover, by the abnormal growth of local municipal debts.

"The abnormal growth of local debts imperatively calls for the intervention of the Legislature. Dangerous facilities for borrowing have been recklessly used. The amount was a little under 4½ per head of the population in 1875, but it is now over 11½. Certain cities have attained an unenviable notoriety for the colossal nature of their debts. Reserving London for special mention, we find that Manchester stands first among provincial cities with a debt of 20,250,000£; Glasgow follows, with 16,250,000£; Birmingham owes almost as much, and Liverpool owes 12,500,000£. The debts of Leeds, Sheffield, Bradford, Salford, Cardiff, Nottingham, Huddersfield, Leicester, and Bolton range, in the above order, from 10,500,000£ to 3,500,000£; while those of a number of other places range from the lower figure to 1,000,000£. The greater part of the loans has been for sewage works and water-supply, for gas and electricity, for parks and recreation grounds, for the erection of town-halls, schools, workhouses, infirmaries, and hospitals, for roads and tramways, for cemeteries and markets, for libraries, museums, baths and wash-houses. Nevertheless, it is probable that, before the terms have expired for which these gigantic loans have been contracted, the gas and electricity works, the methods and sources of water-supply, the system of tramways, the modes of sanitation, will all be superseded, if not rendered useless, by scientific discoveries and practical development."

The writer proposes rigid economy and fuller parliamentary control for a condition of things which shows a "weakness of national and municipal credit which is fraught with grave danger," and he sets forth as remedial measures the following:

"The exercise of a rigid economy in the great spending departments of the public service, like the army and navy; the restoration of the House of Commons of full financial control; an arrest of the tendency to borrow large sums for local purposes (repayment of which should be spread over not more than thirty years, or one generation); the vast outlay upon experimental and structural works, the rapid growth of officialism, and the craze for municipal trading. There is no heroic method of dealing with the complex difficulties; but it may be urged that the same common-sense and business rules should be applied to national and local expenditure that are considered to be imperative in ordinary life."

M. BACHMATIEFF.

The Russian press seems determined that M. Bachmatieff shall not derive any assistance from the reputation it assigns to him. The Novoye Vremya has had more than one article and paragraph on the subject. It declares the new Russian Representative in Tokyo to be a most contentious person, mentions the names of quite a number of his colleagues in Sofia with whom he came to be at daggers drawn during his residence there; says that when he left the Bulgarian capital not a person went to the station to see him off; and pronounces him quite unfit for the Tokyo mission, where a man of tact, liberality and urbanity is needed to restore friendship between the two empires. All the Russian diplomatists who have hitherto occupied the Legation at Tora-nomon came to this country with the best reputation and the most favourable "send-off" and all, with perhaps one exception, justified their records. It is something quite novel to be called on to welcome a Representative of whom the leading journal of his own country speaks in such terms, and we can only entertain the hope that the Novoye Vremya is the victim of prejudice—a not altogether novel mood of that journal.

HOCKEY.

On Saturday morning the first Ladies Hockey match between the Yokohama Club and its newly formed Tokyo rival was played under most favourable conditions on Tsukijima, Tokyo. The teams were as follows:

TOKYO.
Forwards: Misses Cahusac, Silver Hall (Capt.); L. Woodward, A. Swift.

Half-backs: Misses D. Barclay, Hughes; D. Cowen.
Backs: Misses B. Cahusac and Forbes.

YOKOHAMA.
Forwards: Misses M. Kilby; E. Kilby (Capt.); Dinsdale.

Half-backs: Misses Moss, Kilby and Talbot.

Backs: Misses A. Blundell and Cain.

Goal: Miss E. Blundell.

Referee: Miss Purvis.

Up to half time a fast game was played, but during the second half the play was not so exciting to the onlookers as both teams stood on the defensive. Special mention must be made of Miss Kilby for Yokohama and of Miss L. Woodward for Tokyo, both of whom played a strong game throughout. In the first half an attempt to block a long shot by Miss Hughes resulted in a goal for Tokyo, and the visitors failing to equalize, the victory thus rested with Tokyo. It is expected that the return match will take place on April 14th.

The Yokohama team was entertained at lunch by the Tokyo team.

Above we gave the outlines of an event specially interesting on account of its pioneer character, namely, the first hockey match between Yokohama and Tokyo. The latter team won by one goal and it is right to mention that the credit of the achievement must not be discounted on the hypothesis that the winners derived an advantage from familiarity with the ground, for, as it happened, the ground was equally strange to both sides, having been hired for the day's use only. According to the original arrangement the Tokyo players were to have gone to Yokohama and met their opponents on the Club ground there but the weather interfered with this programme, so the Yokohama ladies took the field. We understand that much of the labour of organizing the Tokyo team devolved on Miss M. Hall and Miss Barclay.

THE FORMOSAN EARTHQUAKE.

The following final figures have been published with regard to the Formosan earthquake:—

PEOPLE.
Killed—Japanese 12 (including 6 women).
Formosans 1,216 (including 671 women).
Severely injured—Japanese 6 (including 2 women).
Formosans 866 (including 486 women).
Slightly injured—Japanese 17 (including 5 women).
Formosans 1,440 (including 819 women).
BUILDINGS.
Destroyed .....	5,556
Partially destroyed .....	3,383
Much injured .....	1,520
Slightly injured .....	469

It would be natural that in a region where the Formosan population greatly exceeds Japanese, the casualties suffered by the former should be proportionally larger, but there was a special factor in this case, namely, the peculiar construction of Formosan houses. The fact that among the total of Formosans killed and wounded—namely 3,522—no less than 1,976 were women, is accounted for by the Formosan habit of never allowing the women to go out of doors.

POLICE RESTRAINT AT FIRES.

In addition to the pilfering at the recent fire on the Yokohama Bluff, to which we referred in our report, other cases of theft have come to our notice. It seems a pity that the police do not now exercise that control over the thoroughfares which they used to do. As soon as a fire was located in those days, ropes were stretched across the streets and none but persons who could prove their qualification to enter the enclosed area were allowed to pass. At the fire which took place the other day on the Bluff no such restraint seems to have existed, and the result was that Japanese carrying lanterns gained access to the compounds and even to the interior of the burning and threatened houses. Much looting took place, and for that, we regret to say the Bluff Police force must be held largely responsible. Moreover the intrusion of unauthorised persons not merely conduces to thieving but the efforts of the police and the firemen are materially hindered. It is to be hoped that the authorities will endeavour to effect an improvement in this direction.

THE LATE COLONEL FURSE.

The death took place in the General Hospital, Yokohama, at 10 a.m. on Tuesday, of Colonel George Armand Furse, C.B., who had come to Japan to repair his health—and incidentally to make a study of this country's botany—but whose ailments were apparently too far advanced to admit of restoration. Colonel Furse was not considered in a precarious condition when he left home but by the time he reached Hongkong his state was such that he was urged to proceed to Japan at once. Kidney disease was the chief factor in hastening the sad event.

Colonel Furse was on the retired list of the British Army. He was born at Rome in 1834, being the second son of Mr. William Henry Furse (who died in 1849). He was educated in private schools and abroad. We take the following from "Who's Who":—

Appointed to 42nd Royal Highland Regiment, 1855; joined Headquarters of the regiment in the Crimea, 1855; served during the Mutiny, 1857; present at Siege of Lucknow (medal with clasp); D.A.A.G. Western District, 1872-73; on special service to Ashantee, 1873-74 (mentioned twice in dispatches, brevet majority and medal with clasp); A.D.C. to Commander-in-Chief, Bombay, 1874-78; D.A.Q.M.G. Headquarters, 1879-84; A.A.G. and Director of Transport, Soudan Expedition, 1884-85 (mentioned in dispatches, brevet of Colonel, medal with clasp, bronze star); A.A.G. and Q.M.G. Eastern District, 1886; A.A.G. Southern District, 1886-89. Decorated C.B. in 1887. ## THE RUSSIANS IN MANCHURIA.

The recently received news is confirmed that the Russians are apprehending and deporting all Japanese who attempt to penetrate further north than Supingchih in Manchuria. No explanation is offered of this procedure nor do we learn that any notice was given of such an intention, and the consequence is that heavy loss is entailed upon many Japanese traders who proceed to northern Manchuria in good faith. Considering that Japanese alone are thus discriminated again the action of the Russians seems at best very ungracious. So long as they are in military occupation they are of course entitled to exclude all foreigners, but why should they exercise the veto against Japanese alone? That is certainly not the way to restore friendly feeling between the two nations.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Many in Yokohama will hear with regret that news has arrived conveying intelligence of the death at Portsmouth of Mr. F. W. Thomas, for many years manager of Messrs. Brett & Co. Mr. Thomas, who was a most warm-hearted Irishman, spent some twelve years in Japan and won a host of friends. When he left Yokohama, grievously afflicted, some two years ago, his intimates looked forward hopefully to seeing him return restored in health and mind. But it was not to be.

An industrial exhibition will be held in Osaka from April 10th. The opening will take place at 10 a.m. on that day, the ceremony being conducted by Mr. Matsuoka, Minister for Agriculture and Commerce.

The Goni Industrial Competition Society will erect an exhibition building at Uchi-

Yamashita-cho, Kojimachi, Tokyo. The exhibition will be opened on Sept. 1st and last till Nov. 30th. The exhibits comprise woven goods, porcelain, copper and lacquered wares, paper goods, carpets, fine arts, beverages, and curios manufactured during the last few years.

S. Kondo, a merchant of Tokyo, has entered into an agreement with a German trader of Yokohama to start a celluloid manufactory in Shidzuoka with a capital of a million yen.

The Kanegafuchi Cotton Spinning Co. intends to establish a factory in Tientsin or some other place in China, employing native women as factory hands.

The representatives of thirty-two provincial industrial exhibitions will hold a meeting in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce on April 27th. They propose to circulate copies of the directory of industrial and commercial men, and samples and specimens of Japanese products among residents in foreign countries; and to collect samples and specimens from foreign countries, etc.

The destroyer Yamabiko, formerly the Ryeshitelni which was captured at Chefoo, has been sent to the Nagahama Quarantine Station for disinfection on account of the frequent appearance of cases of typhus among her crew. It is said that before she was taken, some of the Russian crew suffered from the disease. As naval operations were still going on disinfecting measures were not resorted to when she came into Japanese hands, and she was employed on active service.

It is reported by the Jiji that Mr. M. C. Goncalves Pereira, Brazilian Minister in Tokyo, will be removed shortly to a post in one of the South American countries. The vacancy will be filled by Mr. Louis de Fella, First Secretary of the Legation in Venezuela, who will be promoted to the rank of Minister-Resident.

His Imperial Highness Prince Kanin, representing the Emperor invited to the Shiba Detached Palace on the 31st instant the members of both Houses of the Diet and the Ministers of State, by way of farewell entertainment on the prorogation of the Diet. The Prince made a short address expressing in marked terms the Sovereign's satisfaction at the spirit of coöperation shown by the members of both Houses, and Prince Tokugawa, President of the House of Peers, replied on behalf of the Diet. The guests then partook of luncheon and the party broke up at 2 o'clock.

The question of the repayment of the house tax to foreigners in Yokohama is still left unsettled by the Yokohama City Office. Latest reports say that the authorities intend to borrow money from the Department of Finance for the purpose of repayment, to which end the authorities of the City Office and the Treasury are now in negotiation. The Boyeki says that owing to the resignation of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and to pressure of work on other Ministers of State in connexion with the Diet, the matter of the house tax has been postponed. The present negotiations, however, will be concluded before the end of this month.

Two new houses of Princes of the Blood were established on Friday. H.H. Yasuhiko Kuni was given the title of Asaka-no-miya, and Prince Tsunehisa Kitashirakawa, Taketa-no-miya. Prince Asaka is the eighth son of the late Prince Akahito, and is now a student of the Central Military Preparatory School. Prince Taketa is the eldest son of the late Prince Yoshihisa Kitashirakawa, and is now a Lieutenant of Cavalry. Both Princes are to be married shortly.

In view of the importance of the subject we willingly state at Mr. C. V. Sale's request that the third and fourth paragraphs of his address to the meeting of the Board of Trade should be transposed. Also that in reply to Mr. E. C. Davis (the Chairman) he said: "During the last two years conditions have been quite exceptional."

Telephonic communication between Tokyo and Kyushu (Saseho), 943 miles, has been opened. The charge per five minutes is twelve yen.

Another seizure of Japanese subjects by the Russian authorities in Harbin is reported. Technically speaking the Russians appear to be justified in making these seizures, inasmuch as they have issued notices forbidding the entry of Japanese subjects into the Harbin region. But the hardship is that this veto applies to Japanese subjects alone: it does not extend to all foreign nationals and it thus constitutes a very irksome discrimination. The Japanese go for purpose of trade, but it is said that those hitherto apprehended and deported had set out from Vladivostock in complete ignorance of the veto. The Russians appear to regard them as spies, for it is inconceivable that they can object to the presence of peaceful Japanese merchants in their midst. Presumably there are in Harbin conditions which Japan's recent enemy desires to hide from her observation, but certainly this harsh policy towards Japanese subjects will not conduce to restore friendly feeling between the two countries.

Rumours have been circulating lately concerning the manufacture of glass in Japan; they are now confirmed, as it appears that a foreign syndicate has been formed on a great scale for the establishing of factories for this business in Osaka and several other towns. The capital is provided by prominent French, Belgian, English and Japanese capitalists.

A second group of foreign capitalists has been formed for the establishing in Japan of modern saw mills to be worked under the latest principles of electricity. Here again Japanese capitalists have joined with their foreign friends. Belgium and France are sending technical experts for the glass, while Canada furnishes its best men for the saw mills. Both companies will shortly be registered as Kabushiki Kaisha (joint-stock companies), their general interests being placed in the hands of Mr. R. Loonen.

Captured ships to be sold by tender at the Naval Department are as follows:

Steamers—Yaura Maru, Urusau Maru, King Arthur, Bawtry, Ryuhki Maru, Kinsho Maru, Scotsman, Shibetoro Maru, Vegga, Henry Balkow, Nagae Maru, Palos, Lydia, and Montara.

Sailing vessels.—Autye, Oabe (?).

It is estimated that the world's production of pig iron in 1905 was 53,000,000 tons, a gain of 8,000,000 tons over the preceding year. The United States last year produced 22,992,380 tons, or 43.3 per cent. of the world's total production. In 1905 the United States produced 6,495,347 tons more pig iron than in 1904, so that all but 1,500,000 tons of the gain of 8,000,000 tons was contributed by the United States. The United States produced about 37 per cent. of the world's production in 1904, and at the present rate of progress it will not be long before it is producing more than one-half of the world's output. This table gives production in the three leading countries, the United States, Germany and Great Britain, over a series of years:—

	United States, gross tons.	Gr. Britain, metric tons.	Germany, metric tons.
1905	22,992,380	9,150,000	10,925,000
1904	16,197,033	8,400,000	10,100,000
1903	18,009,252	8,811,204	10,085,634
1902	17,821,307	8,679,535	8,529,810
1901	15,878,354	7,928,647	7,860,893
1900	13,789,242	8,959,691	8,520,541
1899	13,620,703	9,421,435	8,143,132
1898	11,773,934	8,609,719	7,312,766
1897	9,652,680	8,796,465	6,881,466
1896	8,623,127	8,659,681	6,372,575

In twenty years the increase in the pig-iron production of the United States has been 477 per cent.; Great Britain, 23 per cent., and Germany, 194 per cent. In 1885, for example, the United States turned out not much over 4,000,000 tons. Germany's progress has been rather pronounced, but Great Britain has made no particular headway. Of the world's output of iron last year the United States Steel Corporation produced about 20 per cent., but its consumption amounted to nearly 25 per cent.

The telegrams continue to represent Germany as having suffered a great disappointment in connexion with the Algenciras conference, and as having fallen back upon an extended programme of naval expansion. But Berlin says that it was a matter of compromise, and that France having yielded on the questions of communications and customs, Germany made concessions in other directions. It will probably be safe to accept the latter version. Germany certainly laboured under the disadvantage of isolation at the conference, as she stood alone, confronted by England and France. But, on the other hand, all three Powers certainly carried to the council chamber a determination to find a peaceful exit from the entanglement, and such a determination meant and could only mean a compromise. It is extravagant to talk of defeat or surrender in such a context. Each side met the other half way, and if Germany's concessions have been unexpectedly considerable—which we do not know to have been the case, though the fact seems probable—then all that need be said is that she showed her praiseworthy love of peace. Journalists and telegraphists have managed to impart to this affair a complexion which it probably never wore in the eyes of the principals.

A group of 500 guns are in process of collection inside the Babasaki Gate and near the entrance to the Palace. These are pieces taken from the Russians. They are mostly ship's guns. There is one monster, a 24-cent. Canet, and a scarcely smaller 23-cent. This grouping of ordnance is preparatory to the grand review which is to take place on the 30th instant. The place where the guns are to be marshalled is not now accessible to the public owing to the building of a new bridge over the moat, but the big weapons may be seen occasionally en route for their destination, whither they are dragged by scores of perspiring coolies.

Captain Ijuin, of the Mikasa, who threw himself from the upper window of a building in Kure on receipt of news of the sinking of the ship, has nearly recovered, but is still under medical treatment. Operations for floating the big vessel, having been partially suspended by the cold weather, are now to be vigorously resumed. The recent attempt to pump her out resulted in raising her through a distance of two feet, but the leaks proved to have been insufficiently stopped and she settled down again in her old place. The work of salving her has not proved so easy as was anticipated. It is now under the charge of Vice-Admiral Arai, who raised the Varyag.

It is officially reported that Prince Arthur of Connaught, who left Yokohama on March 16th by the Empress of Japan, arrived at Vancouver safely on April 1st.

Complaint is made by one of our contemporaries that much harm is being done to Normal Schools by a failure to readjust the rates paid to their Directors and teachers. As things are situated to-day the Middle School rates are much higher than those of Normal Schools. Consequently the best teachers are rapidly going off to the former Schools to the detriment of the highly important Normal Schools. The salaries paid to Directors of Normal Schools range from 800 yen a year to 1,800 yen, according to the regulations of the Department of Education, but as a matter of fact no Director is paid more than 1,400 yen a year. Whereas there are Middle Schools that pay their Directors 2,000 yen a year. These schools are controlled by Prefectural or Municipal Assemblies, and one ken often competes with another in the endeavour to secure the services of efficient Directors. It is said that the Mombusho recognizes the evils attendant on the discrepancy in the salaries paid and is anxious to remedy them, but that the Finance Department refuses to sanction a rise in the salaries of the Normal School teachers, fearing that it would mean increased rates in other Central Government Schools. In the meantime the education of the country's Primary School teachers is suffering in the way indicated above. We have often pointed out in these columns that most of the school teachers are under-paid in Japan. Hence it happens that many men who are well qualified to serve the Government as instructors go into business rather than pass their days in privation and discomfort on the pittance honoured with the title of "salary" in this country.

In a statement just issued to the British press, Lord Roberts outlines the policy of the National Service League, to which we alluded in a recent issue. Its two main objects are thus set forth:—"To ensure peace and security for the British Empire by organizing our land forces in such a manner that we may not only be able to defend successfully any portion of the Empire against attack, but also that the strength of our defensive arrangements may render any attack improbable; and to improve the moral and physical condition of the nation, and thereby to increase its industrial efficiency." With a view to attaining these two objects, the League advocates that every man of sound physique should be legally liable during certain years of his life to be called upon for service in the United Kingdom in case of emergency, and that to fit him for this duty he shall be legally obliged to undergo three or four months military age. As much military instruction as possible must be given to all boys previous to their reaching the military age, and stress is laid on the fact that the early training will have a beneficial effect on the moral and physical condition of the population at large.

It is urged that the spirit of patriotism should be instilled in all boys by the teachers; that, instruction in the use of the rifle shooting should be made a national sport. With regard to auxiliary forces, the League desires it to be clearly understood that its proposals in the matter of universal training are not intended to discourage the patriotic exertions of those who have given or are giving their voluntary services to the country. Lord Roberts adds:—"I invite those who may not be in accord with the whole programme to give their assistance towards the early realisation of any of the proposed measures with which they concur."

We learn that the ship Daylight which caught fire in Yokkaichi harbour the other day and was sunk has now been refloated, the fire having been extinguished.

It is stated that after the great review on the 30th instant there will be two marriage celebrations in the Imperial Palace: one will be to mark the union of Her Imperial Highness Princess Tsune with the recently created Prince Takeda; the other, the union of Her Imperial Highness Princess Kane with the recently created Prince Asaka. These two Princes will be raised to the rank of Shinno (Imperial Princes) in consequence of their marriages with the Sovereign's daughters. The rank recently conferred on them on their occasion of their appointment as heads of branch families of the Kitashirakawa and Kuni Houses, respectively, was that of Ō. In short, from "Tsunehisa-Ō" and "Yasuhiko-Ō" they will become "Tsunehisa Shinno" and "Yasuhiko Shinno."

The new Ambassador to Paris, Mr. Kurino, left Tokyo by the 7 a.m. train on the 4th instant.

Captain Uchiyama, of the Navy, and Colonel Kuroi of the Army, who are to be attached to the Japanese Legation in St. Petersburg, left Tokyo by the 9 a.m. train on the same day.

Lt.-Colonel Tanaka, attaché of the Japanese Embassy in Washington, also left Tokyo by the 9 a.m. train.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

The movement for establishing a Yokohama Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—which must commend itself to every humane person—is showing considerable progress and some practical outcome seems imminent. Promises of support have been received from H. E. Governor Suifu, Mayor Ichihara, Inspector Inouye, Supt. Ikariyama, Messrs. Masujima, Arima Kobayashi and Hashimoto. Among foreigners the supporters include Messrs. M. Beart, B. Runge, James Walter, V. A. Caesar Hawkins, B. C. Howard, L. J. Healing, Consul General von Syburg, A. G. Morey Weale, J. de Cuers de Cogolin, M. Surth, E. C. Davis, C. K. Marshall Martin, F. S. James, Dr. Percy, L. D. Adam, A. C. Hutton Potts, H. C. Gulland, N. F. Smith, Johnstone McClure, E. Austin, E. Mendelson, Rev. E. S. Booth, M. Russell, E. W. Frazar, J. Archer, H. Lefebvre, F. R. Daniel, C. Allen, G. W. Rogers, O. Strome, Dr. Reidhaar, Consul S. Warning, Dr. R. Mischke, Chev. van den Berch van Heemstede, M. Mendelson, R. J. Ward, W. F. Page, Rev. H. Loomis, W. Keen, P. Messer, R. L. Schwabe, W. N. Wright, and others, whilst a large number of ladies have expressed their willingness to join the association. It is proposed, we learn, to shortly hold a public meeting for formally establishing the society, adopting rules and electing officers. It is expected that Mr. Hiroi, secretary to the Tokyo S.P.C.A., will attend and explain the methods adopted in Tokyo.

"THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE."

IT is certainly a good sign for England that she should be sensitive to the great events happening around her in the world; that she should apply them to her own case and deduce from them whatever lessons they have to teach. She has given evidence of this mood on several occasions during the past 50 years, and the latest indication is the appearance of a brochure entitled "The Decline and Fall of the British Empire." The term, it will be at once seen, is borrowed from GIBBON, and indeed the anonymous author tells us quite frankly that having found an almost absolutely accurate parallel between the causes to which the great historian attributes the destruction of the Roman Empire and the causes which he, the author, assigns as responsible for the destruction of the British, he has adopted the analogy in detail. A picturesque element is added to his work by describing it as a textbook appointed for use in the national schools of Japan in the year 2005, so that it becomes, in fact, a prediction of the state of affairs that will exist a century hence. A terrible state of affairs is pictured for Great Britain. Her Empire, we are told, will then have been completely broken up. India will have fallen to Russia; South Africa to Germany; Canada will be an integral part of the United States and Australia will have become a portion of the MIKADO'S dominions. The causes responsible for this disruption are very clearly set forth, and may be epitomized as follows:—First the British legislature became a body of mere talkers without any practical qualities; secondly, urban life attracted the people more than rural; they lost their vigour and virility, and, abandoning their love for athletic sports as practised by people in general, learned to care only for displays by professional athletes such as the gladiatorial shows at Rome had been, and ceased to practise agriculture; fourthly, their fondness for a sea-faring life waned, their ships gradually obtained crews from Oriental or continental sources and they ceased to possess any efficient naval reserves; fifthly, they gradually abandoned themselves to refinement and luxury so that healthy mothers or stalwart sons became altogether exceptional; sixthly, literary and dramatic taste declined, "the flimsy musical comedy, the illustrated magazine and the newspaper becoming the chief intellectual food of the nation;" seventhly, their physique and health gradually fell away so that the infantry soldier became unable to carry his knapsack; eighthly, they abandoned their old robust Christian faith and became disciples of a number of bewildering and invertebrate creeds; ninthly, their taxes swelled to excessive dimensions and they fell into the habit of entrusting all enterprises to the State; tenthly, they introduced false systems of education, attempting to teach at school what could be taught properly at home only and failing to impart, at the latter, any useful instruction in subjects connected with practical industry; and, lastly, they became unable to defend themselves owing to neglect of the military training to which every competent nation must subject its units. It will be seen from this epitome of his views that the author finds the times out of joint on a very extended scale. It will also probably be agreed that his analysis errs on the side of exaggeration. One has to note, however, that he does not propose any wholesale remedy. He is not even an advocate of conscription. In that branch of his subject all that he insists on is that every able-bodied citizen should be called out once for a period of 3 or 4 months to learn the duties of a soldier's life. Such is the view which seems to be acquiring force among thoughtful Englishmen, namely, that instruction in military duties should form just as integral a part of a youth's education as instruction in reading or writing. It is an easy, though perhaps a somewhat evasive, substitute for conscription, the terrible system to which so many nations condemn themselves. But apart from details the question suggested by his brochure is whether the author does not arraign the inevitable result of civilization rather than its abuses. Do not some of the conditions which he regards as evidence of decadence overtake every nation growing in years and in intellectual refinement? Twelve thousand copies of the brochure have been sold and probably ten times as many Englishmen are pondering over its contents, with the result that a wholesome discussion has been started. For our own part we regard it as an excellent sign that such volumes are written. They show not merely that Englishmen can speak and hear unpleasant truths without flinching, but also that there is capacity to detect the germs of disease in the body politic and to diagnose their consequences if left unremedied.

ZIMBABWE.

EVERY since the gigantic ruins of Zimbabwe were rediscovered in Rhodesia archaeologists have had a problem presented to them which has proved a delicate morsel for heated discussion. The most widely divergent theories have been evolved to account for their origin, their age and their builders, and speculation has naturally run riot in every particular, some theorists even rivaling Mr. RIDER HAGGARD in weaving a South African myth. The enthusiasts having had their free run almost undisturbed the time has come for the iconoclast to make his appearance for the purpose of shattering the fairy-tales spun from unsubstantial imagination. And he has arrived in the fullness of the opportunity in the person of Mr. D. RANDALL MACIVER, who last year, at the request of the British Association, explored and reported upon the ruins of Rhodesia. Mr. MACIVER is evidently one of those fine, stern dogmatists who rejoice not in freely drawn speculations or in any fairy fancy. He rejects the romantic theory that SOLOMON and the QUEEN OF SHEBA, or Oriental contemporaries of theirs, were the builders of the ruined cities, and considers that his excavations have proved the Rhodesian ruins to belong to one period—mediaeval and post mediaeval date and that the builders were a negro, or negroid, race closely akin to the present dwellers in the country. The so-called elliptical temple of Zimbabwe, which Mr. MACIVER suggests is a Royal kraal, was like the other ruins, built by Kaffirs, and its date is decided by fragments of stoneware, Nankin china, and mediaeval Arabic glass. The stone walls which had been so much admired were, in his opinion, merely more or less elaborate ring fences enclosing the huts of the settlements. Naturally after throwing such a bombshell into the camp of the archaeologists, Mr. MACIVER was bombarded with criticisms, but at the last meeting of the Royal Geographical Society he found supporters, for letters were read from Dr. ARTHUR EVANS stating that Mr. MACIVER had made out a satisfactory case for the late mediaeval origin of the buildings. Professor GREGORY, of Glasgow, would not concede the point, however, and referred to the shape of the gold ingot as suggesting Phœnician influence in the early mining industry of Rhodesia. Another point made against Mr. MACIVER was that he had failed to note the conical towers, the carved birds and phalli, all of which had impressed Sir HARRY JOHNSTON and inclined him to adhere to the belief that the ruins belonged to remote antiquity. Mr. F. C. SELOUS, who also took part in the discussion, commented on the absence of inscriptions on the ruins and thought that this demonstrated that their builders could not have belonged to a highly civilized race. Mr. MACIVER declined to accept the rough, rude outline sculptures as phallic emblems and refused to enter upon a discussion concerning the probable whereabouts of King SOLOMON'S Mines as outside the limits of his observations. And there the question rests for the moment, piquant in its unanswerableness.

FIRES.

At 10 a.m. on April 1st, fire broke out at the Tomonari Match Factory, Aramachi, Kobe, destroying one building. One factory girl was killed and four were injured.

Two fires occurred in Tokyo on the night of April 1st. One took place in Takiyama-cho, Kyobashi, burning down three houses. Another was in Iriya-cho, Shitaya, and resulted in six buildings being destroyed.

A telegram from Wonsan, Korea, says that fire broke out on board the steamer Matsu Maru at 2 a.m. on April 1st, causing damage in the engine room. The loss is estimated at about three thousand yen.

On the night of March 31st, fire broke out at the Besshi Copper Mine destroying a machine shop. No one sustained injury.

A telegram to the Osaka Mainichi says that Sweden has purchased the rights over the water-power required for the nationalized electric railways.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

"The Church of the Past and the Church of the Future" is the title of an article by Mr. Sekiguchi in a recent number of the Koye (Roman Catholic). The writer thinks that for regular attendance at church in all weathers Roman Catholic Japanese Christians are not to be beaten. But he is of opinion that there is too strong a tendency among Christians in all churches to be content with mere attendance at public services. The influence exercised by Christian converts on society generally is not what it ought to be, says Mr. Sekiguchi. Members of the various Churches should feel bound to each other not only by their having a common object of worship, but by mutual love and by the feeling that they all alike have a mission to fulfil in the world. There is nothing like hearty co-operation in benevolent work for binding the members of a Christian corporation together.

Among the items of foreign religious news published by the Koye one refers to the paucity of Roman Catholic priests in the Philippine Islands. We are told that there are numerous parishes there where there is no priest and there are thousands of Christians who are unable to receive the sacraments of the Church. An earnest appeal for more priests has been sent to the London St. Joseph Foreign Missionary Society. A paragraph quoted from the Ave Maria by the Koye is on the dearth of theological students in both England and America. There is a well-known Roman Catholic Divinity Hall at Mills Hill in London, which was founded by Cardinal Vaughan. When that institution was opened it was anticipated that there would be a large number of English and Irish candidates for admission. But the English and Irish applications have been so few, we are informed, that were it not for the foreign students who have come there from all parts of Europe, from Holland especially, the institution would have had to be closed some little time ago. But at present the outlook is said to be a little brighter.

Here is another quotation of some importance that the Koye makes from the Ave Maria. It has hitherto been supposed that Protestant Orders were recognized as valid by the Greek Church and that a clergyman belonging to any Protestant Episcopal Church could take office in the Greek Church without being re-ordained. This is a mistake, as has been shown by the case of an American Episcopalian clergyman residing in Boston. This gentleman quarrelled with his Bishop and decided to join the Russian Church in New York. But he had to be re-confirmed and ordained first deacon and afterwards priest before he was allowed to act as a minister of the Greek Church. He was told that the Greek Church does not recognize ordination by English or American Bishops as valid. Clergymen in English orders are mere laymen in the eyes of this Church. This, it is said, has caused much ill feeling among Anglican Churches throughout the world.

It is stated by the Koye that the total number of Roman Catholics in the United States according to the latest statistics is 12,651,944, and the total number of priests is 14,484.

The Jidai Shichō (異潮) welcomes the development of independence of thought in modern Japan. There are some people, says the Jidai Shichō, who do nothing but preach submission to the authority of others; who, when men decide on their own belief and their own courses of action independently, call it arbitrariness, conceit, self-will, and what not. But if we look back to the history of the development of thought, scientific, philosophic and religious, in past ages, we shall find that all the great thinkers and leaders of their fellow-men were at first denounced as arbitrarily setting themselves up against the world. It was so with Socrates, Descartes, Bacon, Kant and Hegel. It was so even with Christ and Confucius. The progress of mankind has always originated from individual development; from the inner consciousness of men who have known how to think for themselves. Many people fail to understand the term "egoistic" and interpret it as waga mama shugi (the principle of self-will.) To follow the bent of one's own mind, to give full play to one's own special powers, to act up to the teaching of one's own self-consciousness, despite what others think or say this is plainly the road to all enlightenment and to all high attainment. There is no hope for this nation unless it can give up slavishness of thought among us. A new self-consciousness seems to be germinating. To repress it or denounce it as some seem inclined to do is to take away from us all chance of distinguishing ourselves in the world. What is wanted to-day is strong individuality, strong self-consciousness. Our politicians need it, our writers need it, our religious teachers need it. It is powerful personality or presence that impresses men. Those who possess this are qualified to become leaders of their fellow-men. Upon them depends the progress of the world, concludes the Jidai Shichō.

We read in the Seikyō Shimpō (Greek Church) that on February 18th the Society, which was formed by the Greek Church Christians for the purpose of administering various comforts, material and spiritual, to the Russian prisoners was dissolved. A solemn service was then held in the Surugadai Cathedral to return thanks to God for the display of Christian brotherly love to defeated foes. On that occasion Bishop Nicolai delivered an address in which he dwelt on the many benefits which will accrue from the action of the Japanese Christians. The kindness they showed to the captives will never be forgotten by the Russian people, the Bishop thinks, and it will go far towards cementing friendship between the two nations in future. On behalf of the Russian people Bishop Nicolai tendered his hearty thanks to the Japanese Christians for all they had done. He then referred to the peculiar position in which he himself was placed during the war. He was a Russian mixing daily with his country's enemies and watching their rejoicing over the victories they had won. One would suppose that such a position must have involved much mental distress, but the sympathy for the Bishop was so strong among the Christians and their feelings towards him so refined that he is now able to testify that nothing was said or done to give him pain. The Bishop distinctly says that the victories won by the Japanese were given to them by God (Shu yori tamawaritaru senshō no aida ni, etc.). Referring to his own position in a hostile country, he observes:—"In carrying on the work of the Church together with you all I seemed to lose my Russian nationality and only to remember that we were all brothers and sisters in Christ. At the beginning of the war it was your wish that I should remain with you and you promised to take good care of me. That promise you faithfully kept. But you not only kept my body from harm, you kept my mind in a happy state. For this I offer you my profoundest thanks. The memory of this will be one of the greatest comforts that I enjoy during the remaining years of my life." The Bishop then dwells on the beautiful manner in which the Japanese Christians carried out the precept "Love your enemies." He says that it will never be forgotten by the Mother Church in Russia how her young daughter in Japan has acted towards Russian captives. The interest taken in mission work in this country in Russia has been increased immensely by the noble conduct of the Greek Christians and their pastors during the war. Many of these Christians subscribed liberally out of their slender means towards providing material comforts for their Russian co-religionists. No words, the Bishop said, could fully express the gratitude and supreme satisfaction he felt on reviewing all that had happened among his Christians during the war.

Whether any good purpose is served by the collection of diverse opinions on religious questions in this country some people will seriously doubt, though it perhaps helps us in a measure to answer the question so often put by Europeans and Americans, "What do the Japanese really think on religion?" The Shin Bukkyō started a series of questions last summer some of the replies to which we are translating and publishing in these Summaries. We now read in the March 15th number of the Seikyō Shimpō that another Buddhist magazine, the Mujinō (The Quenchless Light) some little time ago sent around the three following questions to various scholars. (1) Should students expound and advocate religion or not? (2) If they should do so, then what religion do you recommend? (3) Please give your views on the tendency of religious thought among students.

Some thirty-four answers are quoted in the Seikyō Shimpō. They are just what might have been expected from those who took the trouble to reply. Each school of thought is more or less represented. We have only space for a few specimens. Many of the replies show a good deal of common-sense.

Mr. Arima Yusei.—(1) Violent and aggressive espousal of religion by students does harm. (2) The religion they espouse should be ethical and philosophical in character. (3) Religion is about to become popular among students. Religious teachers will do well to make preparations for guiding and improving the minds of students.

Mr. G. Sakurai.—(1) Students should espouse religion. (2) Either Occidentalized Shintō Buddhism or Japonized Protestant Christianity. (3) Religion is more prosperous among students than it was ten or twenty years ago, but frequently morbid phenomena are observable.

Dr. Murakami Sensei.—(1) They should do so. (2) They should espouse the religion which they believe. (3) No reply.

Mr. Kinohira Masayoshi (1) Their espousal of religion is useless. (2) In this country religion and learning are quite separate, so there is no need for students to take to religion. (3) The greater part of the religious spirit found in Japan to-day is one of the evils of society.

Dr. Anezaki (1) They most certainly should do so. (2) Whatever religion they believe they should follow and develop. (3) I leave others to reply to this question.

Mr. S. Ishikawa (1) They should do so. (2) It must be a living and active religion. (3) There are religions in Japan to-day that have been poisoned.

Mr. Shimoda Jirō (1) They will do well to go in for philosophy rather than for religion. (3) Among students to-day there is a great tendency to run to extremes. Those who doubt, doubt too much; those who think they know things are over confident in the trustworthiness of their knowledge. Students' minds need turning to practical subjects and as far as feasible to science.

Mr. K. Fujioka (1) If they adopt suitable methods, there is no objection to the advocacy of religion by students. (2) Their religion should be of the emotional rather than the rational type, and should be essentially warm-hearted. (3) As regards the majority of students the word "indifferent" best describes their state of mind.

Dr. Shigeno, Dr. Katō Hiroyuki, Mr. Tokutomi, Dr. Motora and some others replied that they were too busy to send answers. Mr. Uchimura Kanzō's reply was the shortest. Simply Iken nashi (I have no opinion on the subject).

The Seikyō Shimpō, commenting on the answers observes that there is a preponderance of Buddhist opinion on the questions put, and that this opinion is hardly representative enough to satisfy the general public. The refusals to answer which came from some the Seikyō Shimpō condemns as lacking in consideration. It urges the Mujinō to try the experiment once more.

We read in the Asahi Shimbun that there is some difficulty connected with the tenure of the land on which the Surugadai Cathedral stands. It was originally granted to the Russian Legation, but not for perpetual use for the purpose it is now employed. Bishop Nicolai a few days ago informed a newspaper agent that the matter was now under consideration, but that he could give no details at present.

The Universalist is a monthly religious newspaper which figures as the organ of liberal-minded Christians. It is published in Nagoya. In a recent issue the attitude of the Universalists to Japanese religious teaching generally is stated to be one of intelligent appreciation. The Universalists recognize, they tell us, how much Japan was benefited by the teaching of Buddhist and Shintō priests in past ages, and they perceive even in ancestor worship many elements that Christian propagandists may turn to good account. It is pointed out that the worship of ancestors by the Japanese unmistakably teaches us the following things:—(1) That the Japanese certainly do believe in the survival of the spirits of the dead. So they are spiritualists and not materialists. (2) This cult of theirs proves that they believe in a future life and the immortality of the soul. (3) The belief that the spirits of the dead still exist and that they have not severed their connection with this world affects the lives of Japanese in various ways. (4) Those who have entered the world of spirits are considered to be still in close communion with the members of the family who remain on earth. Those above and those below form one united, perfect family. The Universalist discusses filial piety in the same sympathetic tones. The attitude of Universalists to Japanese religious faith generally is, we are told, one of admiration and devotion.

The Seikō (Success), a magazine that is much read by students, in one of its March numbers, publishes the views of several well known scholars on Human Life and the World in which we live. Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō says that men's views of life are determined largely by disposition, environment and education. The optimism of Leibnitz and the pessimism of Schopenhauer were in each case the product of the three above-named factors. There is no getting rid of the subjective element. Human life and the world are coloured with the tints which come from our own minds. The "gloom and the glow" are alike "hues of our own, fresh borrowed from the heart." The spiritualist and the materialist look at the world from entirely different standpoints. So human life, art, literature, and the like, do not convey the same ideas to them. To decide which view of life is right and which is wrong is next to impossible, as there is no court of appeal beyond the views of different men none of whom can claim infallibility. But when men desire to find some kind of a solution to the enigmas of life they either rely on their intellects or on their feelings to supply it. If they adopt the former course, they study philosophy earnestly, in the hope of finding some explanation of the puzzling ways of nature in the writings of deep thinkers. If they despair of obtaining light from reason, they fall back on their emotions and appeal to religion, allowing faith to put an end to all their mental perplexities.

Writing on the same subject Mr. Abe Isoo remarks:—As I toil along day after day I always have an object in view, but I cannot say that I realize it. It seems to me that we human beings are always striving for something which we do not obtain. We pursue objects which seem to move on as we draw near them. Some might suppose that continued failure to reach an ideal object would drive men to despair. But with me it is not so. I realize that the constant endeavour to reach up to something higher not only gives interest to life, but it strengthens the mind in various ways. To have an object in life means perpetual progress towards that object. Were it an attainable object, it would fail to act as a continual stimulus to further efforts. Man is a part of the great scheme of the universe. To know that one is fulfilling a great purpose, that one is a link in a long chain of causes and effects gives significance to life and makes one feel that it is a joyful thing to live.

There is one feature of the Fukui Shimpō in which it has always seemed to us to excel all other religious newspapers. It makes a point of publishing week after week a number of short newsy paragraphs on a great variety of topics more or less connected with religion. This gives an interest to the paper which no other religious paper known to us possesses in the same degree. The columns of most of the religious newspapers are too exclusively occupied with long doctrinal discourses of a somewhat high and dry type. The reports of meetings published are very poorly edited, too frequently consisting of a mere record of proceedings that is quite meaningless to readers of the papers. One of the pages in the Fukui

Shimpō, bearing the title 友垣, Tomogaki (Our Friends), is devoted to the publication of short letters containing suggestions, calling attention to weaknesses and defects, or propounding questions for others to answer. We give a few specimens of the kind of letters published. One young man writes thus:—How is it that the study of the Bible fails to attract interest in our churches? Bible Classes held in connection with Sunday Schools are poorly attended. Is it that those who conduct these classes don't know how to make their expositions interesting? Or do our Christians think that they can get to know all that is necessary about the meaning of the Scriptures by perusing periodicals devoted to exegesis like the Seisho no Tomo? Or have they been prejudiced against biblical study by reading very lame attempts at exposition. Whatever be the cause, the fact remains that our Christians do not study the Bible earnestly.

Another young man writes in favour of electing women as elders in Presbyterian Churches. He tells us that the subject is being seriously discussed in some churches. He thinks that women are in many cases much more earnest in religious matters than men. He believes that to put them into office would be the means of imparting new energy to churches. That it has not been done in the West is of no consequence. Japan aims at being a pioneer henceforth in a great many things and for her to lead the way in elevating Christian women to offices of responsibility would redound to her honour.

In a former number of the Fukui Shimpō a correspondent said that he had observed that the Christians who patronized music a good deal were usually lacking in religious earnestness. Their faith was weak. This elicited the natural reply in the number now before us that music and strong faith may be found together, but that no rule can be laid down about such matters, as music is not essentially religious at all, though it is often made to serve religious purposes. That a great many earnest Christians in Japan have no taste for music is doubtless a fact. But their indifference to one of the finest of arts is not to be traced to their religious belief, but to other causes.

The editor of the Gokyo, Dr. Takagi, informs us that he regards the growth of mysticism observable in certain spheres of religious thought in this country as by no means an unpromising sign. As a contrast to the intense realism of the past it is to be welcomed; though it can only be regarded as an intermediate stage of religious thought. Tyndal once observed that the possession of an ideal and aspirations were essential elements in human life. We have certain mystics among us, says the Gokyo, who tell us that they have communion with the unseen world and with spiritual beings. Now there is no limit to the experiences of mankind and what visions other men may see or what their inner consciousness teaches them none of us is competent to determine. But it is our habit to submit all alleged mental religious experiences to the test of what we call common-sense and when they seem to be very contrary to it to treat them as the product of a diseased mind. This is as it should be, but it is possible to go too far. Are there not many actual individual experiences that, while seeming to other minds to be silly, wild or crazy, exercise a powerful influence for good over the persons subject to them? Undoubtedly there are, nevertheless, such experiences cannot be granted any authority over other minds. Christians at any rate must appeal to common-sense. We are sorry to see, says the Gokyo, that some Christians hold common-sense in contempt in cases where their own experience is concerned. We are not for banishing mysticism from religious life by any means, but personal experiences of any and every kind should not be allowed to upset the balance of the Christian mind. Then, referring to the case of Mr. Tsunajima Ryōsen, which has caused so much excitement in some quarters, Dr. Takagi says that the ideas of this self-styled prophet are mere idle speculations. He pretends to have received special revelations on a bed of sickness. But not so did the fundamental truths of Christianity take their rise. The visions of this new prophet may be dismissed as the morbid wanderings of an unbalanced mind.

The Gokyo of March 24th, publishes an article on the Methodist Union problem contributed by a pastor signing himself "C. N." The tone of his remarks is one of impatience at the slow progress the Methodist Union movement is making. Here is the pith of what he has to say on this important subject:—I am constantly asked by people what the Methodists are doing. I try to make out we are doing a lot. But this is all talk. At heart I am sad at what we are not doing (Shikashi kore wa hon no kuchi-saki bakari no koto de, jissu wao iyeba, kokoro no uchi de wa itsu mo naku no de aru). Even men like myself whose connection with the Church has been comparatively of short duration have their ideas as to the steps that it is necessary to take to effect the desired union, though we do not pretend that they are as trustworthy as the ideas entertained by our elder brethren. It seems to me that the whole question depends on whether authority is to be given to the Japanese pastors and Christian laymen to take the necessary steps for union or whether it is still to be retained by the foreign missionaries. As things now stand, we Japanese possess very little authority, as is evidenced by the fact that we are only allowed to send two or three representatives to the Methodist General Conferences held once in every four years. Throughout the country half of the officers of the Church are under the control of missionaries who know comparatively little of Japanese affairs and who are unable to put implicit trust in Japanese. The consequence is that mission work is carried on in a formal manner only, and there is no real progress.* In writing thus I lay perhaps myself open to the charge of being anti-missionary, of advocating the expulsion of missionaries from the country. But these are not my sentiments at all. I simply maintain that no great union scheme can be carried out without giving authority to the Japanese Churches. It is only by adopting this measure that the permanency of any arrangements made can be secured. There is, no doubt, much difference of opinion among us as to whether the present is a suitable time for effecting this big change. Many of our pastors even treat the whole subject of the proposed union of Methodist Churches with considerable indifference. But has it not been invariably the case in all ages and countries with big reforms, that they have been opposed by the majority of the people concerned and have only been carried out by the zeal of minorities? To wait till the whole of the Methodist Churches in Japan are anxious for union would be like waiting "a hundred years for the water of the Yellow River to become clear."† There are some who maintain that prior to union our Christians must be better trained, the efficiency of the churches must be increased, and so on. But it is my opinion that all such work will make far more rapid progress after the union has been effected than it does now. The development of churches is always more rapid after they have become self-supporting and independent, and we can only attain to this state by means of union. To say that for us to unite under Japanese leadership is rebellion against the foreign mother churches is absurd. There are those who affirm that after receiving thousands of yen from foreign Mission Boards and after making use of the labours of foreign Missionaries for over 30 years it would be ingratitude on our part to refuse to submit to their authority now. But surely this is putting the matter in a wrong light altogether. The foreign Churches have acted as nurses to infant Japanese churches long enough. It surely cannot be their wish to see us occupying the place of an infant in arms for ever. A wise mother or nurse rejoices to see the child that has been cared for in its tender years growing up to manhood or womanhood in a spirit of self-reliance and independence. Those who try to represent the movement among us in favour of independence as anti-foreign are acting unfairly. It is not a question of race or nationality, but one of policy. We want a strong, prosperous church suited to the country and in sympathy with the leading ideas of the nation. Organizations principally dependent on foreign capital are not in favour in Japan to-day. Some shrink from the proposed union for purely financial reasons. They say that it would be difficult to raise the necessary funds for carrying on the work of the churches. But surely we should be ready to face and master this difficulty. If we have not sufficient spirit for this, then it is mere waste of time to talk of union at all. We must be prepared to sacrifice ourselves on the altar of progress and development. The world is full of self-sacrifice. Every parent has to sacrifice comfort and pleasure for the sake of children. Every age has had to make sacrifices on behalf of posterity. As Christians we must be prepared to forego material advantages that we now enjoy for the sake of the church's future good. To speak unreservedly and honestly, our churches to-day, as though trying to make up for their lack of real strength, go in for an extra amount of exterior ornament. In places where converts and sympathisers are few magnificent churches are erected by means of foreign money the repair of which is a constant burden and source of anxiety to the Christians.* What we need to bear in mind above all things is that no amount of external attractiveness of form will make up for the want of internal improvement and progress. As for buildings, where the church's resources are very limited, the simpler they are the better. Where the bodies of Christians are very small, two or three churches might combine. The feeling that independence and poverty are better than decking oneself out with borrowed feathers needs to be more developed among us. Did not the Puritans of England for the sake of liberty and independence forsake their native land and endure untold hardships and privations in the wilds of North America? Can any great movement be started without the example of such self-sacrifice as these men displayed? If Methodist union in Japan is to be brought about, it can only be done by the readiness of a few earnest men to immolate themselves for the sake of the independence of the Japanese churches. It is no time for each of us to be consulting his own personal interests and convenience. The situation demands whole-hearted devotion to the church's permanent interests. If we have men of character among us, then all things will go well, but without these the possession of authority, elaborate organization and the like can effect nothing. In this article, in the attempt to honestly state what I really think, I may unconsciously have used language that is lacking in the modesty and humility which become a man of my years and position in the church. For this I ask the pardon of readers.

We insert here a few more extracts from the Raise no Umu. (The Existence or Non-Existence of a Future World.)

(9) Mr. Shizui Yūjirō.—The union and harmony of the Great Ego and the Little Ego of the Universe is a subject which nobody can explain. It is one of the marvels of a world which we can't explore. We may liken the next life to a sound sleep or to many other things, but after all the truth is just as Confucius stated it. The knowledge of the future is beyond us. "Not knowing this life even, how can we possibly know the next?"

(10) Mr. I. Yamagata.—I believe there is a future life. As it is merely belief, I can give no reasons for holding it. As for what the future life will be like I have not the faintest notion.

(11) Dr. Tsubouchi Yūzō.—To attempt to reply to such momentous religious questions as you put is not a function that I can fulfil.

(12) Mr. Nukariya Kaiten.—This well known Buddhist orator occupies no less than 10 pages of the Raise no Umu in the discussion of the various views that have been held on the future life. He first divides them into opinions held by ordinary people and opinions held by scientists and philosophers. Among the former the doctrine of metempsychosis, he reminds us, is widely accepted, especially by Buddhists, and a future spiritual existence is believed in by Jews, Christians and Mohammedans.* He gives an elaborate account of the various theories held by learned men as to the future existence of the soul and ends up with a very powerful presentation of the view that the only future life that awaits any of us is perpetuity by means of posterity (Shisen raise setsu). He points out that this view can be held by Buddhists without their having to give up the doctrine of the transmigration of souls; since to believe in the pre-existence of the soul is not necessary as a basis for faith in a future life. While furnishing a translation of Mr. Nukariya's last paragraph, we are conscious that the conciseness and force of the original are not reproducible in English. Here are his ideas: "The view that we shall live in posterity on to distant ages, though apparently a very simple and commonplace view, possesses marvellous significance. It is easy to understand, yet it embodies a principle of great profundity. It is highly rational and in strict agreement with the truths of religion. It is materialistic, without being attended by any of the evils of materialism. It is connected with this life, yet it serves as a firm basis for our faith in the reality of a future life. It enables us to adopt a thoroughly sound policy towards the community in which we live. It is my belief that this view throws an enormous amount of light on human life and gives us endless ground for hope."†

REVIEW.

The Churches and Modern Thought. An Inquiry into the Grounds of Unbelief and an Appeal for Candour, by PHILIP VIVIAN. Watts & Co. 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, London E. C.

"The Churches and Modern Thought" is a work written in popular though far from superficial style: the author has evidently observed and read a great deal in connection with his subject, which is defined in the sub-title as "An Inquiry into the Grounds of Unbelief and an Appeal for Candour." The first chapter treats of the gravity of the situation and in the second section on "The Attitude of the Laity" we have a striking picture of the present state of the so-called religious world in which many of us will at once recognize our own or our neighbours' state of mind with regard to churchgoing and keeping up appearances.

The next five chapters deal with the conclusions reached by means of the higher criticism, the discoveries of science and historical research. They set forth in the clearest manner the manifold difficulties which confront the modern would-be believer in Christian doctrine. Numerous quotations from leading preachers and theologians, principally of the Church of England, show unmistakably that the clergy themselves as well as the vast majority of the laity have succumbed to these difficulties and have practically abandoned belief in the truth of the Old and New Testament narratives and in nearly all the doctrines which make up the Christian religion and without which it becomes a mere set of vague hazy impressions. Nevertheless the same men continue to uphold this sadly mutilated religion as a guarantee of our future welfare and national prosperity, especially when received in its older and more ample form by those simple enough to believe it, the majority of our population as they fondly hope.

* Mr. Nukariya does not seem to be aware that "the resurrection of the body" is part of the Christian Creed; though it is true that far less is said on this subject in pulpits than was the case thirty years ago.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY).

Mr. Vivian opposes this view. His dedication of the book to his Wife and Children is significant of his earnest desire to share the light of the fullest attainable knowledge with all the world and his conviction that such enlightenment can do nothing but good; as he says: "obscurantism has had its day." The chapter exposing the fallacies of Popular Arguments in favour of continuing to inculcate among children and the masses beliefs which the superior educated person finds unworthy of his intelligence and often of his moral sense is one of the best in the book. A trenchant criticism of an imaginative work entitled "When it was Dark" recently commended in a sermon by the Bishop of London, disposes effectually of the contention that the overthrow of our present religious condition would endanger society. On the contrary, numerous undeniable instances are quoted to show the stagnant state of moral and intellectual life characteristic of the "ages of faith" and the present day peoples among whom the church has most power. As a contrast are instanced the many excellencies in the manners and condition of nations where Christianity is unknown or rejected and where there is a prevailing indifference to religious beliefs, China and Japan, for instance.

The consistent support given in the past by the pious of all denominations to religious persecution, war, slavery, popular ignorance, and the view that these evils are beyond man's power to remove (even presumably when aided by divine grace or the faith that will remove mountains) and the steady opposition shown towards the beginnings of toleration, popular education, liberty for the people and elementary women's rights, are facts not to be denied. The parody of Kipling's "Recessional," quoted in a footnote, nearly epitomizes the inmost feelings of many a patriotic, conservative imperialist of to-day.

The churches are further called to account for taking to themselves the credit for such reforms as they opposed in the beginning and only adopted when the tide of public opinion became irresistible. On this point the plea of "guilty" is the only possible one in the face of history's evidence.

In conclusion, the book will no doubt do much good in helping to dispel the mists of cant, humbug, uncertainty, confusion of thought and obscurantism which now envelope so many, hindering them from keeping an honest conscience towards themselves and a clear outlook on their duty towards their neighbours.

Though the bulk of the work is destructive in character, it contains the promise of a reformed way of life which only becomes possible after the old dead matter which would block its progress has been swept away. The author hopes great things from the disinterested zeal for reform which already characterizes the militant rationalists and he looks forward to the time when their numbers will be largely augmented and the moral and material welfare of the mass of mankind will be proportionately increased by their intelligently directed efforts: he summarizes his anticipations thus:—

"When Rationalism reigns supreme:—

1.—Morality will be founded on a firmer basis. Its origin and necessity being better understood, it will also be better practiced, whether in commerce, in politics, or in our social relations, i.e., both in our public and our private conduct. Also the present atmosphere of religious insincerity will be cleared. Relieved of this temptation to deceive our neighbour and even ourselves, our moral fibre will be strengthened, and we shall be far less likely to be hypocrites in other matters.

2.—Social evils will stand a better chance of being redressed.

3.—All religious intolerance will disappear once and for all.

4. An era of peace and happiness may at last be realized, because the methods for its attainment will be scientific and rational.

It may be said that such optimism is absurd, but is it really so?

An examination of the facts recorded in this book will cause the readers, we think, to agree that optimism for the future is quite justifiable.

POLITICS IN MODERN JAPAN AND THE
PRESENT POLITICAL SITUATION.

II.

A casual reader of our first article on this subject might perchance be led to infer from its general tenor that we are opposed to representative government as such. But this is not the case. Whether considered in theory or in practice, representative government is undoubtedly the best form of government possible for securing justice. But it by no means follows that it is the best for all other purposes. The functions which Governments undertake to discharge are so numerous and so complex that it stands to reason that they should be beyond the comprehensions of ordinary intellects, and in every country the majority of the representatives of the people consist of men of only average ability. But the principles of equity which should regulate the conduct of citizens to each other are very simple. If we go back to the rise of representative government in countries like England, France and Spain, we find that in each case the desire for the establishment of just laws originated and sustained the movement which ended in the limitation of monarchical power. It may be well to remark here in connection with the general problem of government that among those who have given most attention to the study of politics there is considerable difference of opinion as to the proper functions of Governments, not a few maintaining that in many cases they attempt too much, interfering with the action of individuals or communities when their interference does nothing but harm. This seems to have been the conviction of the late Mr. Herbert Spencer, as the result of half a century's study of the working of representative government in the West. If it be assumed that the chief object of government is the securing of equitable social relations, representative government certainly secures this end better than any other form of government. But when we come to consider the whole of national life, then it is questionable, whether the highest wisdom and the greatest administrative ability are obtained by resort to representative government pure and simple. Even in a country like England, where this form of government is in a high state of development, the greatest statesmen invariably lead the nation, instead of being led by it, in every national crisis that occurs. Not a few of the functions of government are best discharged by a talented bureaucracy. This, as we shall show later on, is getting to be the conviction of Japanese statesmen.

Japan has been experimenting with various forms of government during the past two decades. As Captain Brinkley observes in his book on Japan:—"She has tried government by the united Clan Statesmen independently of political parties. She has tried government by the Clan statesmen in coalition with a political party. She has tried government by combined political parties independently of the Clan Statesmen. She is now trying government by a section of the Clan Statesmen independently of the other section. All possible variations may be said to have been exhausted."

Early in the Meiji era certain prominent Japanese politicians entertained the notion that in the formation and the parliamentary use it made of political parties Japan would do well to follow in the wake of England. But before long it was discovered that the situation here did not allow of the immediate adoption of that course. In England for centuries politicians naturally grouped themselves under one of two standards. If they were not Whigs, they were Tories. The neutrals and the independents were too few to affect the action of any Government. This state of things rendered party-government comparatively easy. But here in Japan the constituents for forming a strong conservative party were wanting. The whole nation was in favour of change, progress and liberty. There was no real call for the organization of more than one party. But, following the lead of two powerful personalities, Okuma and Itagaki, two parties known as the Kaishinto and the Jiyuto came into existence and subsequently obtained the support of most of the leading younger politicians in the country. These two parties did not differ sufficiently in principle or in the policy advocated to make them suitable rival competitors for office. It is not necessary for us to enumerate here all the comparatively insignificant political parties, factions or clubs which were formed in this country prior to the organization of the Seiyu-kai in September, 1900. Compared with other parties in this country, the Seiyu-kai is certainly entitled to be considered a great party. But it lacks certain elements of stability which characterize great political parties in the West. It has no fixed principles that are worthy of consideration and no fixed policy. The party accepted Marquis Ito as its President, because they believed in his leadership, though they knew that his views as to party-government were different from theirs. Party politicians in Japan have grouped themselves around striking personalities rather than around principles or policies. The Seiyu-kai was long known as Marquis Ito's party and now it is known as Marquis Saionji's. One consequence of this state of things is a lack of spirit and character in the members of parties here, who, as has been pointed out by several Japanese writers, too often follow their leaders like so many sheep.

The question of whether party government can be made a success in this country or not remains unsettled. Representative Government in England may be said to date from the reign of King John, if not from a still earlier period. It now possesses the stability which centuries of gradual growth are wont to give to institutions. Japan's present system of government cannot be said to have grown out of her past history. It is a new shoot that has been grafted on the old stock. The old stock is still very prominent and will be so for another ten or twenty years. One of the difficulties connected with the successful working of parliamentary institutions in this country has been the impossibility of inducing middle-aged men of education, business experience and character to offer themselves as candidates for election to the House of Representatives. The members chosen have been in many instances too young and unbalanced in mind to take part in the work of legislation. During the early sittings of the Diet the discussion of great political, financial and commercial questions by the Lower House was lacking in dignity, seriousness and thoroughness. That House, however, has improved considerably and in the course of the next ten years will gradually assume an entirely different character. But in order to make parliamentary government a success not only must the members of the two Houses be educated in a special manner, but the whole body of electors throughout the country must be made acquainted with vital questions of the day and must possess sufficient information to enable them to decide as to which of two proposed courses it is best for the country to follow. Is the political education of the masses being carried on in a satisfactory manner? We cannot truthfully say that it is. Very little is being done in this direction, less to-day than was attempted 4 or 5 years ago.

As to the amount of power that a political party may justly claim in any country, it depends entirely on the amount of political wisdom, insight and administrative ability that it has at its command. The objection of the Genrō, or older statesmen, to party government in this country seems to most foreign observers to be thoroughly reasonable. These veteran statesmen maintain that at present no political party has among its members a sufficient number of thoroughly trustworthy and staid administrators to warrant its being entrusted with the destinies of the Empire. Though by certain newspapers the older statesmen are denounced as the one great obstacle to political progress; as calculated to render the machinery of government unnecessarily complicated and cumbrous and as seriously interfering with the political training and development of Ministers of State, to foreign onlookers it seems that as a temporary measure in this transition period the habit of consulting retired statesmen on grave issues is a highly judicious precautionary measure. It is rightly maintained by those who object to the interference of the elder statesmen that their action and power tend to lessen to an undesirable extent the weight of responsibility resting on the shoulders of Ministers of State. But we take it that when in the course of another fifteen or twenty years at the most the men who have had the honour of steering the ship of State through so many dangerous channels shall have all passed away, the practice of consulting outsiders on ordinary state affairs will no longer be followed by any Cabinet. It has been asserted that Count Katsura during his tenure of office only consulted the elder statesmen on very important questions and that on ordinary occasions he resented their interference with his administration. In all countries the views of experienced statesmen on grave, complicated questions are highly valued by the men actually administering the Government, and it is for the purpose of securing the services of these political veterans that Privy Councils exist. But the opinion that as a permanent thing the influence now wielded by statesmen who have retired from public life over members of the Cabinet is in excess of what is desirable, seems to us to be incontrovertible. As incidental to a state of transition it may be tolerated, but as a permanent factor in politics in the case of a country like Japan that is bent on eventually modelling her Government as far as possible after the English type, it should be unequivocally denounced.

There are politicians in this country who seem to think that since Japan is plainly not ready for party-government, she cannot do better than so arrange matters that interference with the executive by the legislature shall be next to impossible. Because much of the action of the Diet when in opposition to the Government has been injudicious, certain Japanese on-lookers are in favour of rendering the Cabinet almost entirely independent of the Diet, and they seem to think that this can be effected without getting rid of the Constitution; though there are a few who are so disheartened by the proceedings of the Diet that they would fain see the country resort to the pre-constitution bureaucracy. But it must be quite plain to the majority of thoughtful politicians that one of the chief objects of constitutional government is to enable the legislature to control the executive to a large extent. It is this consideration which makes foreign onlookers regard the failure to establish party-government in this country as a serious check to the development of representative government. If any Cabinet that happens to be in power can practically defy, or can silence, or in any way overawe political parties by the use of certain authority vested in it, or by any other means, then the legislature in this country cannot possibly exercise the functions that are exercised in England by the two Houses of Parliament. The Diet exists not merely to make laws and sanction certain taxes, but also to inquire into the manner in which each Department of State administers its affairs. Some of the most useful discussions in the English House of Commons concern methods of administration. In order to be made thoroughly efficient, Government must be carried on on business principles. Now, the business men who constitute the great bulk of the English members of Parliament are extremely good judges of administration generally, and hence it has happened often that big reforms in administration have resulted from the trenchant criticism to which defective methods have been subjected in Parliament. This is what we want to see here, but which we shall not see for many along day, for reasons which will be given in our next article.

FERRIS SEMINARY COMMENCEMENT.

On Tuesday evening, April 3rd, the friends of the Ferris Seminary joined with the two hundred or more connected with the Institution to fill the enlarged Van Schaick Hall on the occasion of the first Annual Commencement since the increased accommodation has been provided. The Hall as usual lent itself kindly to the simple but effective decorations of palms and flowering plants, while the walls displayed specimens of the year's work in the departments of drawing.

Among the branches taught in the school is that of flower arrangement and a new feature was the display in the wings at the rear of a number of those artistic effects in "Hana-ike" which are at once the despair and the wonder of the foreigner.

After the Invocation by the Rev. R. K. Miller, and the reading of the Imperial Rescript, the following programme was rendered:

In the absence of the music teacher, Miss Moulton, the entire charge of the music has been placed upon Miss Sada Hayashi, and the excellent performance of the musical portion of the entertainment proved that in her hands the former standard has been well maintained in this special feature of the school work.

Specially creditable were the Piano Duett "Sonata D. Major" and the Two Part Song which closed the programme, while the song "Little Mothers" by the ten babies of the school, each armed with a doll took the audience by storm.

All the English work was characterized by a clearness of enunciation that made it a pleasure to listen alike to the songs and to the essays.

Of the latter "Queen Esther" proved a very pretty handling of the old time story.

After the distribution of certificates to the graduates from the various departments, the Principal, Rev E. S. Booth in a few stirring words reminded them in the words of the great scientist Wallace that "Life is traffic in energy," and recalling the fact that the Great Teacher had bade his disciples at the close of their course await the Power from Heaven, he urged the graduates to get filled with this heavenly power and bade them go forth to live, to trade with this energy that their land as well as their associates might be the better for their lives, thus justifying their education whose purpose was to fit them thus to live.

The occasion was memorable on account of this year's graduates from the various departments aggregating the largest number in the history of the institution—fourteen from the Grammar course, three from the English Normal course and seven from the Bible course.

The preparatory department also graduated seventeen pupils. The programme was closed by the Benediction pronounced by the Rev. Henry Loomis.

THE LAW COURTS.

THE RHINE DIVORCE CASE.

The divorce case now proceeding between Mr. Charles F. Rhine and his wife, Mrs. Gretchen Marie Dorothea Rhine came up again on March 30th in the Yokohama District Court.

Mrs. Rhine's Counsel said that the letter which was alleged by Mr. Rhine's counsel to have been left by her on Dec. 25th, 1892, when she deserted her husband, could not be identified and that the handwriting of the address was different from the signature attached to the Power-of-Attorney given to her counsel. Producing an envelope of a letter from Mrs. Rhine, Mr. Sato, Mr. Rhine's counsel, asked the Court to summon a handwriting expert in order to compare the letter with the writing on the envelope and the signature on the Power-of-Attorney.

The Court decided to summon an expert witness at the request of Mr. Rhine's Counsel.

Finally Mrs. Rhine's Counsel, referring to the British law said that adultery, cruel treatment, and desertion, were all sufficient causes for divorce. Mr. Rhine had deserted his wife.

Mr. Rhine's Counsel said that his contention was that Mrs. Rhine left without the consent of her husband.

The Court then adjourned the hearing till April 12th.

CLAIM FOR CHIP-BRAID.

On March 31st, the hearing of a case in which R. Tanaka claims yen 693.83 from Messrs. Carlowitz and Co., was resumed in the Yokohama District Court.

Ishiwatari, a chip-braid manufacturer, at Kawa-saki, was examined as a witness. He stated that he had had business dealings with the plaintiff for over three years and that he sold a quantity of chip-braid to him between Sept. and Nov. last. Counsel had a brief discussion after which the Court decided to give judgment on April 2nd.

THE CHIP-BRAID TRANSACTION.

The case brought by R. Tanaka, a chip-braid merchant, against Messrs Carlowitz and Co., claiming yen 696.83, came up again on April and in the Yokohama District Court. Judge Nakanishi delivered judgment as follows:

1.—Defendants were ordered to pay yen 446.67 to the plaintiff and to bear costs, excepting yen 3.
2.—Plaintiff was ordered to bear yen 3 of costs.

CUSTOMS PROTESTS.

On March 31st, Mr. K. Hashimoto, Director of the Yokohama Customs, gave a decision on a protest filed by Messrs. Singleton, Benda & Co., No. 96, Yamashita-cho. The firm imported, on March 22nd, a number of bell-locks on which the appraisers imposed 20 per cent. ad val. duty in accordance with No. 271 of the tariff, and also 10 per cent. extraordinary special tax. The importers contended that the article should be dealt with under No. 263 of the tariff under door-locks, knobs, bolts, hinges, etc., that the duty should be 15 per cent. ad val. and that the goods are a kind of door-locks. The protest was dismissed on the ground that bell-locks could be regarded as door-locks in form and nature of manufacture.

A decision was delivered on April 4th, by the Director of the Yokohama Customs on a protest instituted by Messrs. L. J. Healing and Co., No. 22, Yokohama. The firm imported underground telegraph wire with certificate of origin on which the appraisers imposed 10 per cent. ad val. duty in accordance with No. 483 of the tariff and 10 per cent. extraordinary tax. The importers contended that the article should be dealt with under No. 13 of the Japan-German Conventional Tariff. The protest was dismissed on the ground that the wire is to be employed as underground wire. The director added that the firm formerly imported similar wire on which they filed a protest after the imposition of the same duty. The Minister for Finance rejected the protest.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

The present session of the Yokohama Literary Society, though rapidly drawing to a close, still maintains its high standard of interest and entertainment. On Friday evening the lecturer was Mr. W. A. de Havilland, of Tokyo, who spoke on the subject of "Go, the universal game of Japan." In presenting his carefully prepared paper he said foreigners accustomed to seeing Japanese playing "Go" wondered at their patience and were puzzled to understand the object of the game or how pleasure could be derived from it. The Japanese themselves say it is too difficult to explain to foreigners. It originated in China and there was mention of the pastime as far back as 2,000 B.C. In 600 A.D. the poet Bayu wrote in praise of the game. The first books on "Go" were published in the reign of the Emperor Sung (960-1106 A.D.) and it was introduced into Japan in the fifth year of the Emperor Hoken, 754 A.D. In Japan the game was highly esteemed and was most fascinating—indeed it was rightly called the great game of Japan. The board was a heavy block of wood stained yellow and generally about 3 or 4 inches square, and the area of play had a margin of half an inch. There were cross lines which gave 18 squares to a side, and on the obverse side there was a slight hollow, a conventional survival of what used to be a large hollow in olden times, in which was placed the bleeding head of any onlooker who assisted or of an opponent who tried to cheat. Instead of "pieces" smooth stones were used, the white stones representing the sun and day and the black stones the moon and night. The black stones were always taken by the weaker player. To lift a stone it must be gripped lightly between the forefinger and the second finger of the right hand, resting it on the nail of the forefinger—an act that required some practice for its graceful performance. The stones are kept in lacquer boxes (tshi-ire) 180 of each. The aim of the players is to secure territory. Each point of intersection in the area of play is counted as one point or mark and the player with most points wins the game. But the territory secured must be surrounded by a cordon of men, and there is another condition which was illustrated by means of a diagram. The field is quite bare at the start. The question of first move is decided by either of the players taking a handful of men at random and holding them in his closed hand. His opponent calls odd or even; the number is counted and if the player has called correctly he has the right of first play and takes black. Black and white move alternately and once placed on a point of intersection a stone can not be moved to another point. Each player decides on the area he proposes to secure and places one man near it as a starting point in the cordon he intends to form; that becomes his base of operations. As the game progresses others are placed in favourable positions until a complete cordon has been formed. Should any of an opponent's men be within this area they must either succeed in making "eyes" or be captured. At least two "eyes" are necessary to ensure security, a process which was illustrated by diagrams. The terms necessary to be understood are the ko, the seki, the me (eye) and the kakeme (false eye) all of which required practical demonstration to be intelligible. Hama are captured men around which a cordon has been formed. The game is concluded when neither of the players is able to secure further territory and when neither is willing to hazard the risk of entering his opponent's territory already enclosed. Points enclosed by neither side—called damme—are filled in and the board arranged so as to simplify the counting. The lecture, which was listened to with much attention, was made clear by a number of diagrams.

A hearty vote of thanks was accorded the lecturer on the proposition of the President, who at a previous opportunity had made sympathetic allusion to the illness of Mr. Cyril Allen, which had prevented that gentleman from lecturing before the Society that evening. He hoped that it was merely a pleasure deferred.

The second part of the programme proved very delightful and brought forth two new performers on the public stage, who received a hearty welcome and even heartier thanks from an appreciative house.

FIRE ON YOKOHAMA BLUFF.

At 11.50 on April 1st an outbreak of fire occurred in or near the bath-room of the dwelling of Mr. S. C. Kaufman, No. 25-A, Bluff, Yokohama. The flames at once spread through the house and further extended to the adjoining dwelling (occupied by Mrs. W. Graham), leaping a distance of about twelve feet separating the houses. These two buildings were entirely destroyed by 2.20 a.m. The fire is reported by the Bluff police to have arisen from charcoal left in the room where it originated. Three firemen sustained slight injuries.

It may be noted that one officer, three non-commissioned officers and ninety-six blue jackets of the Italian cruiser Calabria, now in Yokohama, were landed carrying fire-extinguishing apparatus with the view of assisting the firemen. Before they appeared on the scene, however, the fire, had been all but subdued.

Though the outbreak is officially reported to have occurred about 11.50 p.m. it is more than likely that the fire was smouldering for a quarter of an hour previously. The bath had been used on Sunday night and doubtless the pipe which carried off the smoke and fumes of the charcoal stove had been overheated and so started live embers in the contiguous woodwork. However that may be when Mr. S. C. Kaufman was awakened by crackling sounds outside his bedroom door it was probably about a quarter to twelve and one side of the upper storey of the house was well alight. He opened the door leading out on the upper staircase landing—the house is two storied—but immediately such a blast of smoke, hot air and sundry suggestions of near-by flame drove in his face that he promptly shut the door. He then awakened Mrs. Kaufman, and with an amah, who slept in Mrs. Kaufman's dressing-room they made an attempt to reach the landing by another way, but with quite the same result. The only course open then was to go out through the windows and gain the roof of a sort of portico some 20 feet above the ground, where, having shut all doors and windows behind them, they were for the time in safety. But the flames had now gained complete headway on the other side of the house and were soon leaping into the rooms they had just vacated. Mr. Kaufman had some trouble to restrain those of whom he was in charge from jumping to the gravelled path below but fortunately in response to repeated calls for help assistance was timely at hand, Messrs. W. H. Talbot, R. T. Bell, and other neighbours, who had been aroused, brought a ladder and the party descended not a minute too soon. Had the advancing flames compelled them to drop from the portico broken limbs would probably have been the result. Mrs. Graham and her family gave shelter to the Kaufmans but in a very few minutes that house also caught fire and they had to move again. Mr. and Mrs. Kaufman were partially insured. They lost many valuable articles, and they escaped in the scantiest attire, Mrs. Kaufman in her nightdress and a petticoat; Mr. Kaufman collarless, hatless and bootless, with only such of his everyday wear as he could hastily huddle on.

Both houses, which belong to Mr. F. Retz, were quite destroyed. As this is one of the highest points on the Bluff the pressure of water was not great, and for some time only the merest dribble was available. Later, however, the supply improved and when the fire threatened to leap across to the house of Mr. R. T. Bell, and indeed began to catch on the eaves, a sufficient stream was at the disposal of the firemen and this building was saved, though its contents were much damaged by water and some of the more valuable property in it was stolen.

Most of the damage caused in the three houses is covered by insurance. Mr. Kaufman rented his house furnished from M. Roux, Agent of the Messageries Maritimes, and it is to be presumed that gentleman had insured his furniture.

"THE CAPTIVES OF BABYLON."

Contrary to expectation the performance of Shinn's oratorio "The Captives of Babylon" by the augmented choir of the Union Church drew but a moderate audience to the Van Schaick Hall on Thursday evening. This was an exceedingly great pity for the oratorio presented was the most ambitious work undertaken by the choir since their rendering of selections from "Elijah" two seasons ago, and Mr. W. Karl E. Vincent had brought the chorus work into such a state of high efficiency that nothing but pleasure was to be anticipated. "The Captives of Babylon" contains some very effective writing and nearly all the choruses rise above the average level of works of its kind. On Thursday evening the choir, under the baton of Mr. John Griffin, demonstrated to the full the care and attention which the choirmaster had bestowed upon their training. Seldom has Mr. Vincent's choir shown better form in attack or declamation, and the chorus "Who is Cyrus," and the finale, "Break forth into joy" stand out preeminent in an evening full of really good choral singing. The Chorus, by the way, was composed of the following:—

SOPRANI:—Miss Bunting, Miss E. Bunting, Mrs. J. W. Cain, Miss Cameron, Miss Condon, Mrs. J. F. Drummond, Miss Dunstan, Miss Griffin, Miss Hayaishi, Mrs. J. Kenderdine, Miss Kenderdine, Miss R. Kenderdine, Miss Ioomis, Mrs. J. Macbeth, Mrs. Macfarlane, Mrs. S. H. Moore, Mrs. L. Pollard, Miss Scott, and Mrs. A. H. Windett.

ALTI:—Mrs. A. L. Bagnall, Mrs. G. W. Brockhurst, Mrs. A. A. Bennett, Miss Clausen, Mrs. J. Neil, Mrs. Thom and Mrs. W. K. Wilson.

TENORI:—Mr. F. E. Ellis, Mr. W. Graham, Mr. C. Griffin, Mr. F. Pollard, and Mr. A. W. Quinton.

BASSI:—Mr. O. Kendall, Mr. J. Macbeth, Mr. S. H. Somerton, Mr. R. Wallace and Mr. W. K. Wilson.

The solos were taken by Miss Mendelson, soprano; Mrs. W. T. Payne, contralto; Mr. A. E. Cooper, tenor; and Mr. E. Kendall, bass. Very sympathetic were Miss Mendelson's renderings of the airs allotted to her, while Mrs. Payne's fine voice was heard to full advantage. Mr. Cooper did excellently well, though Oratorio is scarcely his forte, and Mr. E. Kendall carried out the bass work with distinction. To Miss Blundell, as accompanist, high praise must be accorded for the force and brilliancy combined with the requisite restraint which she displayed. One curious feature of the performance was the entire lack of applause until the very close. Did the audience associate any expression of approval with indecorous irreverence? Or were the associations connected with similar performances in Union Church itself temporarily transferred to Van Schaick Hall? At any rate the rapt silence must not be taken as a sign of disapproval for on the audience dispersing expressions of complete satisfaction were heard on every hand.

We understand that an invitation has been received asking the choir to give the Oratorio in Tokyo. We hope they will be able to accede to the request.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The Twenty-third Session of the Japan Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was opened in the College Chapel, Aoyama, Tokyo, on March 28th, 1906, at 7.30 p.m. Bishop M. C. Harris, D.D., LL.D. in the chair.

Organization of the Conference was followed by the administration of the Lord's Supper by Bishop Harris assisted by the Rev. M. Coates and the Presiding Elders of the Districts. The ladies of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society were also present and partook in the service.

The Conference was favored by the presence of a no less distinguished guest than Bishop Bashford, superintendent of the Chinese Missions, now on his way to America to meet the Board of Bishops.

Bishop Bashford gave a stirring address upon the two great commandments of the law. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind and with all thy strength, and thy neighbour as thyself." His argument opposed the Spencerian doctrine of selfish individualism, in favour of the altruistic principle which he holds is dominant in every sphere of life. Love for others is not only the command of the moral law but the working principle of nature. He said the reasonableness of this law of love is recognized by all; but many ask, "Whence comes the power?" To this the Bishop answers, by obedience to the first commandment of supreme love to God. Such love, which can only exist with absolute self surrender to God, will produce the adequate power to love all men and "thy neighbour as thyself."

With this address the Conference adjourned to meet each day for a week at 8.30 a.m.

YOKOHAMA YACHT CLUB.

An extraordinary general meeting of the Yokohama Yacht Club was held at No. 78 Yamashita-cho on Tuesday evening to consider the matter of the Shanghai challenge. Mr. A. R. Catto was in the chair and there were also present Messrs. R. Boyes, H. Gunn, F. Abbey, T. Herlihy, J. Drummond, C. S. Averill, A. Owston, S. H. Dawes, C. B. Clausen, J. Abbey, R. Hay, and G. W. Brockhurst (Hon. Secretary).

The letter from the Shanghai Yacht Club expressing the challenge was read, from which it appeared the choice of that Club lay between Kid, a sloop, and Violet, a lug sloop. The former is of 23.2 feet load water line, and sail area 919 feet, which makes her 27 1/4 rating according to Yokohama rules. The other is 27.9 feet on the water line and carries a sail area of 703.4, which would bring her into Yokohama rating at 26.96.

It was pointed out that no boat now afloat in Yokohama could compete with these craft, especially the Kid, that it would be necessary to build a craft specially to meet the challenge, to be owned by a syndicate consisting of those who were willing to subscribe towards the cost. A Committee consisting of Messrs. T. M. Laffin, A. Owston and R. Boyes was appointed to make the necessary arrangements and to collect subscriptions, but though the meeting was by no means large nearly the cost of a boat was subscribed.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

On April 1st a case of plague was reported in Kobe.

Major-General M. Kono has been promoted to the rank of Lieut.-General, and Colonel Kawasaki, to Major-General.

Lieut. General Matsumura, Commander of the Third Division (Nagoya), arrived at Ujina on March 29th by the Kohina Maru from Dairen.

On the night of April 3rd, Nikko experienced a thunderstorm with hail which measured about four inches in diameter. Barley fields were damaged.

Mr. Sidney Montrie, who has lately returned from London to his birthplace [Shanghai], has greatly distinguished himself as the author of a tragedy, "Judas," which was accepted by Mr. Beerbolm Tree for presentation at His Majesty's but which was, the N. C. Daily News, remarks, most absurdly refused permission by that unaccountable anachronism, the Licensor of Plays.

Hongkong, remarks the Daily Press, has always had the reputation of being cosmopolitan. Certainly it never was truer than it is to-day. There are American, French, German, Russian and Japanese bluejackets seen on the streets these last few days, and though all belong to fighting forces, there is a delightful concord among them which should lead to that better understanding among nations which means peace.

The Eclair publishes the following telegram from Toulon:—"The log book and other documents belonging to the cruiser Sully, which was wrecked on the coast of Indo-China, were on Feb. 13th produced before the Naval Tribunal here. It is stated that the Commander of the vessel is considered to be responsible for the loss of the ship. The preliminary inquiry will soon be brought to a close and the Council of War will meet at the beginning of March to try the case."

While recently inspecting the new Admiralty Dock at Hongkong, Admiral Noel jumped on to what he thought was a hard patch of earth. It was a mud-hole, full of soft yellow mud and the Admiral went in up to his armpits. No one laughed, except one coolie who was promptly thrown into a reservoir. The Admiral was fished out and thoroughly washed down with the hose, and the inspection was concluded.

A tragedy was enacted on the evening of April 2nd at Negishi, Yokohama. A man armed with a large knife broke into the villa of a foreign Catholic Missionary and assaulted a gardener named U. Naito, employed there, injuring him on the breast. The gardener, however, disarmed his assailant and attacked him in turn, inflicting fatal injuries on the head. The gardener reported the affair at the Bluff Police Station.

Writing on the launch of the Dreadnought the New York Times says:—"She is a symbol of the effectiveness, the sincerity, and the power of the alliance between Great Britain and Japan. Had it not been for that alliance the Dreadnought would never have been built, for she is the direct outcome of the naval lessons learned in the Russo-Japanese war. Great Britain was permitted by Japan to station naval attachés in the vessels of Admiral Togo's fleet. Doubtless these observers were the most competent officers the British Admiralty could find, and it is hinted that they included more than one naval constructor. The results of what they learned are all to be incorporated in the giant Dreadnought."

The Imperial Controller of the Council of Russia has just published some interesting details concerning the total cost of the late war with Japan. The entire cost of the various operations connected with the war came to £208,951,500, of which sum £89,250,000 were spent in 1904, and £119,701,500 in 1905. Although the second phase of the war lasted only some months, yet the average rate of expenditure had to be increased very considerably, more especially owing to the enormous cost of fitting out the Second and Third Naval Squadrons. As compared with the war with Turkey in 1877-1878, the late war with Japan cost no less a sum than nearly £106,250,000 more than did that war, for the Russo-Turkish war cost £58,737,500 in 1877, and £50,043,250 in 1878, a total of £108,780,750.

THE DISASTER AT TAKASHIMA.

The Nagasaki Press of Friday publishes further details of the colliery disaster at Takashima. It says:—"The Kakise shaft, where the disaster occurred, has always been considered dangerous, owing to the presence of gas, by the officials and special care has been taken to ensure against accident. There was no indication of danger when the miners commenced work on Wednesday morning and it is not known what caused the accident. At ten o'clock the explosion occurred and almost immediately flames burst out of both pit-mouths; the cage and ventilators were damaged and the former became unworkable. At 10.25 a.m. the flames appeared to be extinguished and half-an-hour later smoke ceased to rise from the pit. At noon the air in the mine was tested by means of a lamp and it was found to be safe to descend. At 2 p.m. a search party entered the mine but could not proceed any distance and appearances indicated that the whole of the men who were in the mine at the time of the explosion had perished. As soon as the occurrence became known, the miners off duty and workmen above ground assembled at the pit but remained orderly. Three clerks, who were in the underground office, perished in the disaster. At 7 p.m., the ventilator being again in working order, an official and five miners descended to search for bodies. They could only proceed 140 feet. Up to yesterday morning, 37 bodies had been recovered; some of the victims were burnt and others were asphyxiated. The miners are giving every assistance in the sad work of recovering their late comrades."

CORRESPONDENCE.

OKAYAMA ORPHANAGE AND FAMINE RELIEF WORK.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE JAPAN MAIL.)

SIR,—This widely known and thoroughly trusted institution has once more proved its right to be considered a national instead of a local institution.

As soon as the situation in the north-east provinces was known Superintendent Ishii visited the afflicted region and advertised in all the papers that the Okayama Orphanage would receive any number of genuinely needy children who might be sent to it. Last week at their annual meeting, the trustees of this brave-hearted institution officially endorsed the superintendent's offer voting that even if as many as one thousand children were sent to Okayama from the famine district or from homes of soldiers and the institution was thrown into debt temporarily, the children were to be received. This vote is now being carried into effect.

Two days ago 241 children with sixteen adults attending them reached Okayama by a special train and were given a cordial welcome at the Orphanage. Unfortunately the superintendent is confined to his bed with a slow run of typhoid fever brought on by overwork and exposure. The formal welcome meeting with band music and cinematograph pictures appointed for last evening had to be stopped almost as soon as it opened, the invalid being unable to endure the noise so close at hand.

The new arrivals were not emaciated but many of them, especially the girls with their long hair, were in a filthy condition, and it will take weeks to get them into a thoroughly clean, healthy, physical condition.

The children range in age from three to fourteen, but the large majority appear to be about seven or eight years old. They all state that their first object in coming to Okayama was to have rice once more for food. Some of them state that they hope to study and learn many useful things so they may return home again and help the poor people of To-hoku. They were generously entertained for three days in Tokyo and shown the sights of the city. All along the way, they were treated to sembei and oranges so that they arrived here with nearly half a car load of cakes. This is good so far as it goes and is fully appreciated. But something more substantial is also sorely needed.

The Orphanage has just spent over five hundred yen on futon alone for the new arrivals. Houses have had to be built or purchased and the running expenses of the institution are doubled. A telegram from Sendai reports that 150 more children are collected and will be started Okayama-ward on March thirtieth. No one can say yet how long this stream will be kept up.

Responses to the appeals for aid in behalf of the three suffering prefectures in the north have been so generous one hesitates to add another. But it seems only fair to let the public know the facts. One of these facts is that Okayama Orphanage has bravely set to work caring for many of these needy northern people and thus far has received very few extra contributions to aid in this timely service.

The writer will be happy to give any further information that may be desired and to receive and pass to the Okayama Orphanage any gifts that may be sent him for that purpose. The need is urgent in the extreme.

Yours, for the children, J. H. PETTEE.
Okayama, March 28, 1906.

A COMPLAINT FROM KYOTO.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—There is a story of a sick man who went to a great physician for advice, and was told of some very simple cure—one which involved neither expense nor inconvenience. Everyone knows how the advice was indignantly spurned. The story has always struck me as being particularly applicable to the Japanese. While schemes are on foot for the erection of palatial hotels, theatres, and other enterprises to attract and please foreign tourists no attention at all is paid to matters involving neither expense nor labour. Take the sanitary condition of Kyoto for example. Now, Kyoto is generally full of foreign tourists at this time of the year, and yet the sanitary carts are allowed to meander about with their offensive burdens at all hours of the day. How simple it would be to promulgate and enforce some law whereby these carts should only be allowed within the city limits from, say, midnight until six in the morning, and how pleased we should all be to see such a reform. But perhaps it is too simple and too easy for the officials to think of undertaking.

Yours faithfully, FOREIGN RESIDENT.
Kyoto, 2nd April, 1906.

London, March 31.

Lord Elgin, in the House of Lords, and Mr. Churchill, in the House of Commons, in reply to questions in Parliament, declared they had no information regarding the resignation of the Natal Ministry, beyond a press telegram. They justified the action of the Imperial Government in suspending the executions, in view of the possibility that Natal might demand the assistance of British troops to repress a native rising.

Later.

The Earl of Elgin, Secretary of State for the Colonies, read a dispatch from Sir H. E. McCallum, Governor of Natal, to which he had replied that in the light of the information now furnished he recognized that the decision in this grave matter rested with Natal. The Governor's dispatch detailed the circumstances, the proceedings of the Court Martial, and the Ministry's resignation, and concluded by expressing the trust that his Lordship would now withdraw the suspension (of the death sentences) which was exciting intense feeling. Lord Elgin in his reply stated that it was never intended to interfere with the action of a responsible Government, but in view of the presence of British troops in the colony the Imperial Government were bound to obtain full information on such a matter. He regretted that the Governor had not supplied that information earlier.

WILD WITH ECZEMA

And Other Itching, Burning,
Scaly Eruptions with
Loss of Hair.

Speedy Cure Treatment.

Bathe the affected parts with Hot Water and Cuticura Soap, to cleanse the surface of crusts and scales, and soften the thickened cuticle. Dry, without hard rubbing, and apply Cuticura Ointment freely, to allay itching, irritation, and inflammation, and soothe and heal, and lastly take Cuticura Resolvent Pills, to cool and cleanse the blood. A single set is often sufficient to cure the most torturing, disfiguring, itching, burning, scaly, pimply humours, eczemas, rashes, irritations, and chafings, with loss of hair, when all else fails.

The agonizing itching and burning of the skin, as in eczema; the frightful scaling, as in psoriasis; the loss of hair and crusting of the scalp, as in scalded head; the facial disfigurement, as in pimples and ringworm; the awful suffering of infants and the anxiety of worn-out parents, as in milk crust, tetter, and salt rheum,—all demand a remedy of almost superhuman virtues to successfully cope with them. Such are the CUTICURA remedies, the purest, sweetest, most speedy and economical curatives for the skin, scalp, and blood ever compounded. Mothers are their warmest friends.

Millions of Women Use Cuticura Soap

Assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes and chafings, in the form of baths for annoying irritations and inflammations of women, or too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes for ulcerative weaknesses, and many sanative, antiseptic purposes which readily suggest themselves, as well as for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (Chocolate Coated) are a new, tasteless, odourless, economical substitute for the celebrated liquid CUTICURA RESOLVENT, as well as for all other blood purifiers and humour cures. Put up in screw-cap pocket vials, containing 60 doses.

CUTICURA Remedies are sold throughout the world. Australian Depot: R. Towns & Co., Sydney. British Depot: 77-78, Charterhouse St., London. French Depot: 1 Rue de la Paix, Paris. POTTER, DANG AND CHAM, Cosm., Sole Props., Boston, U. S. A.

RUSSIA IN MANCHURIA.

A few days ago the public was informed that Russia was not taking any steps to remove her troops from northern Manchuria, and that the new Commander-in-chief in Manchuria harboured aggressive designs of the most pronounced character. Then came news contradicting all this, and explaining that Russia's apparent tardiness of evacuation was due solely to the state of the railway. Nevertheless the Yomiuri Shinbun, the Yorozu Choho, the Nippon and the Niroku take the former version of Russia's procedure as the text for articles which are almost of an inflammatory character. These journals make no secret of their belief in the crookedness of Russia's intentions, and their indignation is sharpened by the intelligence that England and Germany have been pressing Japan to open such parts of Manchuria as she has evacuated, and that the Tsar's Government are preparing to arraign Japan's conduct of the war before the Hague Tribunal. It is not necessary to remind our readers that the four journals mentioned above do not represent the moderate or pacific section of the Japanese Fourth Estate. But we may remind our contemporaries that the explanation of Russia's delay stands valid until it is contradicted; that the opening of Manchuria is a matter of political expedience not less than of commercial facility, and that the latest telegrams do not confirm the original reports of Russia's intentions with regard to the Hague Tribunal. There is not the faintest reason to imagine that Russia entertains any design of embroiling herself again with Japan in the near future at all events, or of following a programme which would make her an object of suspicious enmity in Chinese eyes. Russia has to get healed of her wounds and the process can not be momentary. She may be trusted in the meanwhile to cultivate friendly relations and to abstain from any openly aggressive policy in East Asia. We suggest to the papers enumerated above that no interests can be furthered by such vehement articles as they have just published.

According to telegrams from San Francisco Baron Rosen has handed to Secretary Root a list of charges against Japan which Russia intends to present at the next Hague Conference. The first of them relates to the attacks at Chemulpo and Port Arthur prior to a declaration of war. This subject has been already threshed out by experts, and it has been clearly shown that Japan's action was in accordance with the practice of nations. Possibly the Hague tribunal, in its anxiety to bring the usages of war into closer accord with the expanding principles of civilization, may express an opinion in favour of more formal procedure hereafter, but it can hardly condemn Japan in the face of the precedents already existing. The Asahi's correspondent telegraphs that the United States Government endorses Russia's protest. We take that to signify that the United States Government would gladly welcome the recognised establishment of a doctrine that no nation is free to fire a shot in anger until after it has given public notice of its intention to disturb the peace. The universal recognition of such a doctrine would materially help to preserve tranquillity, and from that point of view it would have Washington's support, but the law could not be made retrospective. It is notable, however, that if the Hague Tribunal were induced to endorse such a doctrine, we should in reality be returning to the practice of the middle ages when cartels of defiance and heralds were the order of the day.

Other points which Russia intends, it is said, to bring forward are the bombardment of towns, the laying of floating mines, the use of converted cruisers and the rights of neutrals. Japan, on her side, will have a great many questions to raise, and the conference may thus prove of the highest interest, as it will be called on to amend the rules of war in accordance with the most modern procedure.

San Francisco telegraphs somewhat sensationally about the relations between China and Russia. Peking is said to be much perturbed by Russia's extreme tardiness in withdrawing her troops from Manchuria, and the Russian forces—now under the orders of Grodtkoff who continues to be credited with aggressive designs—are reported to be ill-treating the Chinese inhabitants to an almost unendurable degree. A rupture between the two countries is represented as imminent. But this news must be accepted with extreme reserve. A year remains of the conventional period during which Russia is pledged to withdraw her army, and it is to Japan that she has directly given the pledge. It would be altogether premature to question her good faith at this stage, nor would China be the Power to take the lead in questioning it. One of our Tokyo contemporaries expresses the opinion that Russia is merely preparing a preface to the negotiations which she has now resumed in Peking, the negotiations arising out of the Portsmouth Treaty. She, wishing, in vulgar parlance, to have her knife in China while the conference is going on because a turn of the weapon will have the effect of making her vis-à-vis amenable. That would be clever, if somewhat unscrupulous, but we strongly suspect that Russia's present position in Manchuria is the result mainly of circumstances over which she has not full control. She may utilize the position for the purposes of the negotiations, but we doubt whether she deliberately created it for the purpose.

Some of our Tokyo contemporaries take the trouble to explain that the Russians are within their rights when they refuse to allow Japanese subjects to penetrate within their lines in northern Manchuria. That, of course is self-evident. So long as the Russians are in military occupation of the country—as they will be for 12 months to come—they are justified in closing the door to the ingress of all aliens. But the point is discrimination. According to the telegrams published in Tokyo, the Japanese are the only nationals excluded, and if that be true there is reason to express discontent though there may not be any ground for formal protest.

We have heard much of the Changchun-Kirin road lately. It is now stated that Russia informed Peking that the Chinese had sent men and materials and were engaged constructing the line. But this is strenuously denied by Chinese officialdom, and the telegram confirms the denial by recounting that a previous application from the Governor of Kirin for permission to raise capital for building the line had been refused by Peking, and it is out of the question that the money can have been obtained subsequently.

We do not in any case appreciate the grounds for a Russian representation to Peking on this subject. Russia has no longer any rights with regard to the Changchun-Kirin road. If she ever had any such rights, she surrendered them by treaty to Japan, and that she should enter any protest now against the Chinese building the line on their own account, seems to us about as reasonable as though she should object to a road in the interior of the Eighteen Provinces. We suspect the whole story to be a canard.

The Changchun-Kirin line continues to be a source of rumour and uneasiness. Lately, as will be remembered, the Asahi Shinbun described at some length an arrangement said to be based on a diplomatic note accompanying the Peking Treaty, namely, that the line was to be built with Chinese and Japanese capital in equal portions and was to be jointly owned for 28 years, at the expiration of which period China should be free to buy out Japan. But a Peking telegraphic despatch to the same journal now alleges that a deputation of Chinese merchants from Kirin reached Peking on the 6th instant, carrying an application in the sense that they should be allowed to construct the road. Peking is reported to have consented and to have guaranteed a sum of 800,000 taels. The Asahi's correspondent denounces this as a flagrant violation of the conventional arrangements between China and Japan, but our readers will probably be disposed to scrutinize the story very closely. There is no fear, we take it, that China will deliberately violate any agreement made with Japan, and it may very well be that the application of the Kirin merchants, assuming it to have been made at all, was in conformity with the alleged arrangement which reserves one half of the capital for China. We ourselves do not know certainly that any such arrangement exists conventionally; we are merely discussing the Asahi's intelligence.

PRINCE FERDINAND.

On the evening of the 5th Marquis and Marchioness Nabeshima gave a ball at their Tokyo residence in honour of His Highness Prince Ferdinand. Nearly all the elite of the capital and many high officers of the Army and Navy were present. Dancing was kept up until supper which was served at a little after eleven o'clock.

His Royal Highness Prince Ferdinand at 9 a.m. on April 7th paid a visit to the Nippon Red Cross Society. He presented a thousand yen to the Society and a quantity of cigarettes to the officers and men who are still under treatment for injuries sustained in the war. At 1.50 p.m., the same day, His Highness left the Kasumigaseki Detached Palace and at 2.13 p.m., departed from Shimbashi, by special train. He arrived at Yokohama at 3.08 p.m. and proceeded at once on board the Calabria, being escorted by the Imperial Reception Committee—Capt. Murakami, of the Navy, and Mr. Fukuda of the Board of Ceremonies,—the Italian Minister, and his staff.

Governor Sufu gave a luncheon party at noon on April 9th, at his official residence in honour of His Royal Highness Prince Ferdinand. Count Mariondo, Commander of the Calabria, and other officers, Count G. C. Vinci-Gigliucci, Italian Minister, and many high officials of the local government were present.

The Italian Prince presented three hundred yen to the Tokyo City Office for the relief of poor people in the city.

CHINA.

Saturday, April 7.

It is stated that the Japanese Authorities have resolved to lose no time in opening to general trade the portions of Manchuria that have been evacuated. Apparently some pressure has been brought on Japan by foreign Powers—rumour specially indicates Germany—in connexion with this matter, but the Tokyo Government has been determined from the first to lose no time in giving effect to the policy which constituted one of the objects of the war. Some arrangements are of course necessary, however, and since China is concerned in them it can not be predicted that they will be very expeditious. It will be curious to see whether the privilege of access will be extended indiscriminately to Russians. Probably it will, and then we shall see the spectacle of Japanese subjects rigorously excluded from all parts of Manchuria which are in Russian tenure, and Russians freely admitted to all parts of Manchuria where the Japanese hold sway. Of course it will be understood that in speaking of the opening of the country we allude only to the parts indicated by treaty for that purpose.

Governor-General Chiao having reported strongly to the Chinese Throne with regard to the great care taken of the Tsing Tombs at Mukden by the Japanese during their year of occupation, the Court at Peking has conveyed to Japan a formal expression of its thanks. When the Japanese official history of the Manchurian war is published, we shall probably hear some interesting details of the fight in the vicinity of these mausolea. The cover they afforded and the necessity of not training heavy artillery on them converted them into one of the most invulnerable strongholds the Russians held during the war.

Monday, April 9.

There appears to be some disturbance at Harbin. The first indication of it conveyed to outsiders was that a force consisting of 3 battalions of infantry followed by a quantity of ammunition, was despatched from Vladivostok on the 2nd instant. This was succeeded by news that 14 or 15 Chinese had been wounded, and on the 3rd a number of Chinese refugees arrived at Vladivostok. It is impossible not to contrast the quiet and orderly withdrawal of the Japanese forces with these constant commotions which mark the sojourn of the Russian troops in Manchuria.

Telegrams published in Tokyo state that the conference about this complication has proved a failure, and that it is to be transferred to Peking, whither the representatives of the Powers concerned are now preparing to proceed. The Chinese produce evidence impugning the conduct of the Roman-Catholic fathers and converts, but the French negotiators refuse to admit its validity. The transfer to Peking means that an amicable exit will be found, as indeed might always have been predicted, but it means also that no settlement can be expected for some time.

Tuesday, April 10.

The Russians have expressed their readiness to hand over on the 21st instant and subsequent days the Changtu-Changchun section of the East-China Railway. It is understood to be a railway in name only, the principal bridges have been demolished, the rails have been torn up and the road-bed is more or less destroyed. Still, such as it is the ceremony of handing it over and receiving it will be performed with all due gravity.

The Asahi has telegrams to the effect that the Russo-Chinese negotiations have been re-opened. Russia has agreed to restore the mines seized by her during the campaign provided that the Chinese Government confirms a part of the concessions granted to her by the former Governor-General of Mukden. She declares her inability to hasten the time of withdrawing her forces, but she pledges herself that the process shall be concluded within the period defined in the Portsmouth Treaty, namely, 28 months.

The present Governor-General of Mukden seems to be a man of petty complaints. He informed Peking, some time ago, that the Japanese troops were putting copper belts round some of the trees at Mukden, and he has now represented that they are erecting poles and conducting surveys near Wiju. Such charges seem almost frivolous, and are scarcely worth diplomatic intervention.

Thursday, April 12.

Although some differences are observable in the various accounts, it seems tolerably certain that some places in southern Manchuria are to be speedily opened to foreign trade. There are strenuous denials that the United States and England have pressed Japan to hasten this procedure or that Germany used almost menacing language to bring about the same result. None of these Powers has interfered at all, and indeed the rumour was always incredible so far as England and the United States are concerned, for these countries know well that Japan's policy is to open Manchuria as speedily as possible and that it was to assert that policy that she went to war. At first when the news reached Japan that trade centres in southern Manchuria were likely to be quickly opened, the lesser journals of Tokyo exhibited some disposition to object, on the ground that until Russia had fully withdrawn from northern Manchuria, Japan ought not to be expected to carry out a treaty which concerns the northern regions as well as the southern. But when that objection is analysed it is found to rest wholly on the hypothesis of renewed Russian aggression in Manchuria, and obviously one of the most effectual steps to avert such a contingency would be this very measure of opening the southern portions. Thus we hear nothing more of these ill-considered objections, and journals like the Nichi Nichi and the Koku-min are frankly pleased at the consummation of a programme which won for Japan the sympathy of the nations. It remains uncertain, however, what are the exact places to be opened. Some accounts speak confidently of Mukden, Antung and Tatungkan (near the mouths of the Yalu), while other speak of Mukden, Antung and two additional marts.

Friday, April 13.

We mentioned in a previous issue that the Chinese Government had expressed, through its Tokyo Representative, Mr. Yang, profound thanks to Japan for the care taken of the Imperial Tombs at Mukden during the period that they were under Japanese military guardianship. The text of the message of thanks is now published. It is an autograph letter from the Emperor of China to the Emperor of Japan, and it contains a very emphatic declaration of gratitude and a high appreciation of the remarkable discipline of the Japanese troops, as evinced by their care of these revered mausolea. The Emperor of Japan, in a brief but graciously worded letter, replied to this expression of thanks.

It is alleged—Asahi telegrams—that the French Representative in Peking, having concluded by the evidence and from careful examination, that the death of the Nanchang Chi-hsien was due to suicide and that no murderous violence of any kind was offered to him, has definitely formulated demands for the dismissal of various officials and the condign punishment of a number of literati. The Peking Government, however, has rejected these demands. It seems strange that such a difference of opinion should continue to exist concerning the manner of a high official's death. If the Chi-hsien was killed, as the Chinese assert, the bare fact ought not to be difficult to ascertain.

It is reported from Nanking that Viceroy Chou Fu, of that city, is drawing up a memorial for presentation to the Throne asking for the promulgation of an Imperial Edict abolishing the custom of buying and selling children as slaves or for other questionable purposes.

The Waiwupu has arranged with Mr. Pokotiloff for an increase of the duty on tea passing through the Kiachta customs, to conform with the general increase of duty as arranged in the Mackay Treaty.

The Waiwupu is still hoping to secure the retrocession of Weihaiwai.

The report of the China Light and Power Co., Ltd., of Hongkong, for the year ended the 28th of February last, shows a divisible balance of $30,220. It is proposed to pay a dividend of 6 per cent on the paid-up capital of $50,000, and carry forward $1,220.

The report for 1905 of Campbell, Moore & Co., Ltd., hairdressers of Hongkong, whose paid-up capital is $12,000, shows a divisible balance of $5,973. It is proposed to pay a dividend of 30 per cent, write off $276 from furniture, place $1,000 to reserve, and carry forward the balance, $1,097.

Prince Palata, Hereditary Chief Prince of the Turgut of Mongols, better known outside the western limits of the Great Wall as Prince of Ili, Outer Mongolia, who has obtained the Imperial sanction to travel abroad, is expected to leave Peking about the middle of April next. Prince Palata of Ili, according to a correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News, has already ordered the numerous retainers and bodyguardsmen who accompanied him to Peking to return to their homes in Ili, keeping only one of the latter, named Tanpa, to wait upon him in his travels. The Prince will first visit Japan and then the United States, where he will make a special study of the economy of the ranches and vast grazing lands and the wheatgrowing regions of the States and territories in the West and middle-West. When he was received in audience the other day their Majesties congratulated the Prince on his desire to see the world, and hoped that other Mongol chiefs and princes would follow his example also.

It is doubtful, says the United States Consul at Amoy, if there is another people on earth as good judges of value as the Chinese. Their average possession of worldly goods is so small that what they do have they know all about. The margin between their expenses is so small, where there is any at all, that every expenditure is watched with the utmost care. They are a thoroughly clothed people, even in the southern provinces, and clothing is even more of social necessity with them than it is with other nations professing to be further advanced in civilisation. It goes without saying, that anything affects them directly and at once. Practically the basis of all their clothing is cotton, or, in the case of the well-to-do, a measure of silk.

In an interview published in the Berliner Tageblatt, General Chang Cheng, Chinese Minister to Berlin, expressed himself with much frankness and decision on the subject of the future of China.

Recent political and military events, he said, had taught the lesson that thorough-going reform in every department was a vital question for the Chinese Empire. It would be necessary to begin with the army and navy in order to be able to withstand the pressure of too zealous friends and to order Chinese affairs in accordance with Chinese wishes and needs. Then if Chinese integrity were at stake and it were necessary to repel unsolicited advice the world would find as much to surprise them in China as they had found in Japan. Their soldiers were excellent military material, and if equipped with modern weapons could not possibly be conquered. The national party, he added, demanded China for the Chinese and were as little in favour of the Japonization as of the Anglicization or the Russification of their country.

One of the first steps towards reform in the Chinese judicature, according to the N.-C. Daily News, will be the establishment of a Judicial Court attached to each prefectural or district city to try civil and criminal cases; these Courts to be presided over by men who have undergone special courses in modern law. These Courts will be independent of the control of the prefect, sub-prefect, or district magistrate, as the case may be, of the city in question, who in former times, and for that matter even now, try all civil and criminal cases within their several jurisdictions, and act as they think best as to methods of obtaining evidence and the like. With the proposed new judicial Courts it will be different; for each judge or presiding magistrate must be guided by the laws now being revised at Peking by Wu Ting-fang and Shen Chia-pên.

At the next ordinary general meeting of shareholders of the Yangtze Insurance Association, Limited, to be held on April 18th, the Directors will recommend the payment of a dividend to shareholders of 20 per cent., $12 per share out of the balance at credit of 1904 account, also a special dividend of 5 per cent., $3 per share out of interest account for 1905, and the transfer of $50,000 to credit of reserve fund, bringing the fund up to $800,000.

The report for 1905 of the Luzon Sugar Refining Co., Ltd., whose paid-up capital is $700,000, shows a loss on working of $26,692, the debit balance carried forward being increased from $85,988 to $132,588.

Lady Piggott organised a concert at Government House, Hongkong, on the 27th ult. which was largely attended, and her Japanese Famine Relief Fund was brought up to $3,300.

The N.-C. Daily News learns that the Consular Reorganisation Bill has passed the U. S. Congress; and that Mr. F. D. Cheshire has been offered and has accepted the post of Inspector-General of Consulates in the Far East, with the permanent rank of Consul-General.

The Hongkong Daily Press says: A very pleasant evening was spent on board H. M. S. King Alfred on 23rd March, when the officers of that ship entertained the officers of the Japan Training Squadron to dinner. The toasts of the King and the Emperor of Japan having been honoured, Commander Consett, in proposing the toast of the guests, said—Gentlemen,—In rising to propose the toast of "Our Guests" I hope you will allow me to say a few words on this, to us, eventful occasion. Very few officers here present have had the honour and pleasure of meeting before any of our brother officers in the Japanese Navy, but we have all read and followed with the keenest interest the accounts of their glorious deeds, which are second to none in the world's history. It was not without emotion that we watched the Japanese Squadron entering this harbour for the first time since the war. It is part of a fleet which has just proved itself magnificent in its efficiency and valour under all conditions. Gentlemen, it is always a pleasure to meet one's friends, but when our friends are heroes as well as our allies, the occasion is indeed to us memorable. We drink to the health of our honoured guests and the glorious Japanese Navy.

THE "IKOMA."

On April 9th the first class armoured cruiser Ikoma was launched at Kure. She was laid down on the 26th of March, 1905, and thus her construction has occupied a little more than a year. Her displacement is 14,650 tons—thus being 900 tons more than that of the Tsukuba, which was launched on the 26th of February last; her length over all is 470 feet, her beam 75 feet, and her draught 26 feet. Further particulars are not given, being withheld by the Naval Department. The Prince Imperial proceeded to Kure for the launch. Admirals Togo, Kamimura, Saito, Yamamoto and other distinguished officers also attended. Admiral Saito, Minister of State for the Navy, read the document naming the ship and then handed it to Vice-Admiral Yamamoto, Port Admiral at Kure, who immediately issued orders for the launch. The Director of the Dockyard, Mr. Kita Kogo, cut the rope and the great vessel glided smoothly down the ways amid deafening cheers from the crews of all the ships in port and from the crowd of spectators on shore. It would be very interesting to know how these cruisers, the Tsukuba and the Ikoma, compare in costliness with similar ships built in England, but we are not likely to obtain any accurate intelligence on that point, for some time at any rate. It is not to be supposed that Japan can yet build as cheaply as England. Nevertheless she is undoubtedly wise in striking out on her own account even though the effort be expensive, for she can never be really strong until she is entirely self-supplying in all matters essential to the conduct of war. The recent struggle gave prominence to her weak point, namely, her incapacity to make good the losses in her Navy. Had Russia been stronger at sea, had she been able to send out a powerful squadron in the third year of the war, Japan's position would have been greatly compromised. But before Japan has to draw the sword again—a contingency which we trust may be infinitely distant—she will have dockyards and steel factories capable of supplementing any losses her squadron may suffer in fight.

It is stated that the Ikoma has points of superiority to the Tsukuba, the experience gained in building the latter having been utilized in the construction of the former. The Kokumin notes that the great source of uneasiness in connexion with the building of these vessels was want of practice in rivetting the plates, but that defect has now been completely overcome. The Tsukuba and the Ikoma are both without rams and in many other respects they display the best teaching of modern naval experience. They rank almost with the battle-ship Mikasa as fighting machines, for although not so heavily armoured as the battle-ship their greater speed constitutes a compensation. One lesson which seems to have been clearly taught by the war is that the fate of naval battles is decided solely by the principal squadrons, the second-class and third-class cruisers being suited solely for subordinate duties. It will therefore be a prime object of States to build powerful vessels. Admiral Makaroff's creed, which had for principal article the use of small, swift cruisers like the Novik, may be said to have gone under with that gallant officer when the Petropavlovsk sank. It has to be noted that the Ikoma is wholly a product of Japanese industry. From her armour-plates to her armament everything has been constructed in this country. The Hochi Shim-bun says that she shows the special results of Japanese experience in the distribution of her armour, in the increased protection furnished for her gunners, in the distribution of her armament and in the shape of the vessel, but it must be confessed that a little more explicitness would be very welcome.

Immediately after the launch of the Ikoma, steps were taken for laying down in her place the Ibuki, another armoured cruiser of 14,600 tons. The berth of the Tsukuba during her building is now occupied by the battle-ship Aki.

We may mention that of the 28 destroyers which form a part of the present naval programme and which will bring the total number of Japanese destroyers to 47, the Asatsuyu is to be launched at Kobe on the 11th instant, and the Asagiri, building at the same place, is nearly finished.

MARQUIS ITO.

At a party given by the Japanese residents of Seoul on the 8th instant in honour of the Resident-General, Marquis Ito said that there had been anxiety in Japan as to the reception he would receive from the Emperor of Korea on assuming office and as to the attitude of Korean officialdom and the Korean nation. So solicitous had His Majesty the Mikado been on this subject that he had sent Captain Inouye, of the Chamberlain's Department, to observe the course of events in Korea and to carry a report to Japan. The Marquis was happy to say that on his arrival the Emperor of Korea had expressed to him the hope that the administration of Korea would be reformed through his exertions, and the Ministers of the Crown had assured him that as this was an opportunity unique in a thousand years they would also make every effort to secure the object in view. These facts were very welcome, and Captain Inouye had happily been able to carry to Japan a favourable account of the situation. If hereafter the interests of the two empires were promoted and their friendship strengthened by his (the Marquis) exertions, he should feel that the trust reposed in him had been justified. He trusted that if he, on his side, spared no pains to attain these ends, his nationals in Korea would co-operate with him heartily for the credit of Japan.

The Japanese Chargé d'Affaires in Peking, according to a telegraphic despatch to Jiji Shimpô, has applied to the Wai-wu-pu for the opening of Mukden and Antung to foreign trade during the course of next month. His Excellency Na Tung consented, so far as he was himself concerned, but said that he should consult Prince Ching and thereafter give a definite reply. It was thought that this reply would not be made until after the return of Mr. Uchida from Hankow.

The above application is said to have been made by the Japanese Chargé d'Affaires on the 7th instant. A later message, dated April 9th, and published by the Asahi Shimbun, says that the Wai-wu-pu has instructed Viceroy Yuan and Governor-General Chiao (of Mukden) that in consequence of applications received from the Governments of Japan and the United States, Mukden and Antung must be opened within the course of the Chinese fourth month (May).

Mukden is now within two days' journey of Antung by the Japanese military line.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

It has been finally decided that General Baron Kodama shall be appointed Chief of the Head Quarter Staff, vice Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, who retires. This involves Baron Kodama's resignation of the post of Governor General of Formosa, in which position he is to be succeeded by General Viscount Sakuma, now Commander-in-chief of the Tokyo District. The nation will welcome Baron Kodama's elevation to the head of the Staff, but it will not be without regret that the distinguished officer resigns his Governor-generalship of Formosa, where he has done such fine work and shown such real interest in the difficult task. Nothing is yet confidently predicted as to General Sakuma's successor but one of three Manchurian heroes is spoken of, namely, Generals Kuroki, Oku and Nogi. General Viscount Sakuma did not hold a command in the war with Russia. He made his fame when he led the Japanese forces to the attack of Wei-hai-wei, eleven years ago. The expectation is that Major-General Fukushima will be the Vice-Chief of Staff under Baron Kodama, and that Dr. Goto will remain head of the civil government of Formosa.

A feature of the grand military review that is to take place on the 30th inst., is that the Emperor will invite 6,300 officers to luncheon at the Shinjuku Park. Already preparations have been commenced for this big entertainment. A large body of men are engaged constructing a new road from the Aoyama parade-ground to the Shinjuku Park, which, on this occasion, will be entered from the rear and not from the front. On the following day—31st—General Terauchi and the new chief of the Head Quarter Staff—who, we may observe, is not yet gazetted—will have permission to give a garden party in the Shinjuku Park. The invitations for this latter function are expected to exceed eight thousand.

We may here mention that the 4th of May has been selected by the Tokyo City for the last of its triumphal celebrations to the Army. Those invited to the Hibiya Park will be 5,200 officers, and "sake and fish" will be sent to 35,900 rank and file.

Japanese newspapers allege there have been many goings and comings between Marquis Oyama, Marquis Yamagata, Baron Kodama, Count Katsura, General Terauchi, Marquis Saionji and the Cabinet Ministers during the past few days, and that some extensive steps of military reform are likely to be taken in the sequel of these conferences. It is also alleged that on the occasion of the great military review on the 30th instant there will be a meeting of all the Lieut.-Generals in command of Divisions throughout the Empire, and that extensive changes in the various high offices will result. There is talk of General Terauchi insisting on carrying out the intention which he showed so strongly at the time of the fall of the Katsura Cabinet, the intention of resigning, but our readers will perceive that thus far everything is vague.

The Minister of State for War has summoned all the lieutenant-generals in command of Divisions to assemble in Tokyo on the 24th instant for the purpose of discussing a scheme of military reforms. According to the Fiji Shimpō these reforms relate to the following:—

- 1.—Field and mountain artillery and transport corps.
- 2.—Building of railways in Korea and Manchuria.
- 3.—Increase of arsenals.

- 4.—Increase of railway corps.
- 5.—Organization of a balloon corps.
- 6.—Changes in organization of cavalry and artillery, including the organization of horse-artillery (kishohei).

An army officer, speaking in the columns of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, indicates the organization of mounted infantry as another reform which will be discussed, but whether it will find approval seems uncertain. One difficulty connected with it is that the training of soldiers for mounted infantry duties could scarcely be accomplished in the period now fixed for service with the colours.

Major-General Nakamura and Lieut.-Colonel Kinoshita have left Tokyo for Manchuria in order to take delivery of the East China Railway south of Changchun (Kwan-ching-tsz) from Russian Commissioners. They will meet on April 18th at Changtu.

General Oshima (Yoshinasa), Governor-General of Kwantung, will leave Liaoyang on April 13th for home to be present at the great military review which is to take place at the end of this month. On the way home, he will pay a visit to Marquis Ito, Resident-General in Korea.

Major-General Sasaki has been promoted to the rank of Lieut.-General and placed on the reserve list.

The change in the chief of the Head Quarter Staff has taken place as expected, Marquis Oyama retiring and Viscount Kodama succeeding him. We write "Viscount Kodama," because that officer's title of "Baron" is now changed to "Viscount" in consideration of his services in Formosa. It is noticeable that the new patent of nobility is granted explicitly on account of Formosa and has nothing to do with services rendered in connexion with the war. For these latter Viscount Kodama will doubtless receive the title of "Count." The post of vice-chief of the Head Quarter Staff remains thus far unfilled, but it is confidently expected that Major-General Fukushima will be appointed. There is, however, some talk of Major-General Iguchi. Dr. Goto, chief of the civil administration in Formosa, has been created a Baron.

It is stated that the reason of General Viscount Sakuma remaining at home throughout the Russo-Chinese war was that an affection of the lungs made it impossible for him to take the field. He goes to Formosa because the warm climate there is likely to suit him.

Some of our Tokyo contemporaries regard Viscount Kodama's promotion as a guide to the nature of the patents of nobility that will be conferred in connexion with the war. The officer most distinguished in the nation's estimation is Admiral Togo, who has no title of nobility. Doubtless he will be raised at once to the rank of "Count" as there are many precedents for such a measure. But in the case of men who already have titles, only one step in rank will be granted. Thus Count Nozu will become a Marquis, Viscount Kodama a Count and Barons Kuroki, Oku, Kawamura and Nogi will become Viscounts, while several Vice-Admirals and Lieut.-Generals will receive the title of Baron.

The retirement of Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama is regarded as a natural step which the distinguished officer had contemplated for some time. The two Marquises, Yamagata and Oyama, may be regarded as the "Genro" of the Army. It is impossible to over-estimate the services rendered by them to their country. Marshal Oyama rose to the high post of Minister of War in 1880, and ever since that time his service in conspicuous positions has been continuous. He is still a hale and hearty veteran but his retirement from an active post is in accordance with Japanese traditions. Tokyo newspapers speak warmly of his service in the war and express the conviction that although he gives up the post of Chief of Staff, his country will continue to reap much value from his counsels.

Viscount Kodama's reward for services in Formosa is also universally approved. It is recalled that when he went to the island things were still in a most unsettled condition, and nothing like security of life and property existed. A very different state of affairs now exists. Moreover, in 1898, when the Viscount accepted the post of Governor-General, Formosa had a revenue of only 6¼ million yen, while now the figure is 26 millions, and the Treasury was assisting it to the extent of from 7 to 10 million yen annually whereas now the island is self-supporting. Viscount Kodama has therefore every title to the honours now bestowed on him, and not less must be said of Baron Goto, who has the record of never having made a mistake in the administration of Formosan affairs, and who happily remains at his post.

FUNERAL OF MR. ARTHUR T. KNAPP.

On Saturday at 4 p.m. many friends gathered at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Knapp, to accompany the remains of their only son Arthur to rest in the old Cemetery. The Church of England service for the dead was read by the Rev. W. P. G. Field, M.A., its impressiveness intensified by the restrained emotion of the speaker. The ashes were borne by Drs. Davies, Munro, and Hall and Mr. Thorn. At the grave the last words of the service were spoken and the last farewell taken, in the soft sunshine of an afternoon in spring. Of a retiring and somewhat shy disposition Arthur Knapp was known intimately to but a few. Those who knew him best found under the placid and gentle exterior, a heart attuned to chivalry, with a noble contempt for all that was mean, and a purity of mind rarely to be met with in any man. Unfortunately, his nervous system was somewhat strained by the arduous study which he imposed upon himself in former years, and this perhaps led to a certain lack of ambition which often characterises the literary recluse. Under other circumstances his profound learning and discernment would have placed him in the foremost ranks of his time.

Music, in its higher sense, he had made a special study. Not only an exceptional pianist, he had by insight and diligent study acquired a complete knowledge of its theoretical and historical aspects. His loss is keenly felt by all who knew and loved him.

THE STUDENTS OF CAMBRIDGE AND THE IMPERIAL UNIVERSITY.

The students of Cambridge have sent to the Imperial University of Tokyo through Marquis Ito, a very beautifully printed and bound copy of the New Testament. They assign as their reason for this somewhat incongruous present that the Japanese conducted the late war in a truly Christian spirit, and accordingly the Bible of Christianity is offered for the acceptance of the Imperial University. Mr. Kodama, Secretary of the Residency-General, has carried the gift to Tokyo and will place it in the hands of Mr. Hamao, President of the University. One can not help speculating as to the manner of reception that would be given to the Buddhist Sutras were a copy of them sent by the students of the Tokyo University to their Cambridge contemporaries. Yet Buddhism is essentially the creed of mercy.

A GREAT MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Monday, April 9.

At a general meeting of the medical societies of the Empire on the 5th instant, Dr. Ishigami Toru read a paper on the discovery of a remedy for tuberculosis. Dr. Ishigami has a hospital in Osaka. It was he that accompanied Dr. Awoyama when the latter was sent to Hongkong by invitation of the Colonial Government to conduct researches in connexion with the plague bacillus. He has been investigating this subject of tuberculosis for many years, and he claims to have discovered a remedy which will reduce the mortality by 30 per cent. In the spring of last year he made known this anti-toxin to seven hospitals, where it has subsequently been tested by 6 doctors, with the result that out of 219 patients 79 recovered, 80 improved greatly, 15 died and the remainder can not be accurately accounted for as they left the hospital of their own accord. Dr. Ishigami's paper seems to have produced an impression on the medical men assembled at the meeting. He does not pretend to have succeeded in the case of tuberculosis as completely as Dr. Kitasato has succeeded in the case of diphtheria, but he thinks that the new remedy give great promise.

Wednesday, April 11.

In a recent issue we stated, on the authority of Japanese journals, that Dr. Ishigami Osaka had discovered a serum believed to be efficacious in curing tuberculosis if treatment be given within the first six months of the malady. Another remarkable discovery is said to have been announced before the Japanese Medical Congress now assembled in Tokyo. It is an instrument called denonki (electric auscultator) which, so far as we can understand, is to take the place of the choshinki (stethoscope) and of all other means of external diagnosis. The inventor is Dr. Sakamoto Riisai and he has worked at the instrument for 10 years. He claims—and his medical colleagues seem to have been convinced of the justice of his claim by examination—that the denonki enables a physician to determine the nature of a disease from its earliest stages, and thus to apply the correct remedy from the first. Apparently the principle is that atomic vibration is set up by the instrument, and detection of anything abnormal is then determined with accuracy hitherto quite unknown. We can not speak confidently about the matter, but some of our Tokyo contemporaries are enthusiastic over the discovery.

Thursday, April 12.

Tokyo papers are eloquent in their allusions to Dr. Sakamoto's discovery of a new auscultatory instrument. The name given to it hitherto has been denon-ki but it is now spoken of as denon-kei. After reading the descriptions now given we find that there is not much to add to what we have already written, namely, that the action of the new instrument is two-fold, namely, to set up electric vibration of the atoms of the part to be examined and to provide means of clearly hearing the sound of these vibrations. Naturally, a special course of training would be required to equip a medical man for using the denon-kei successfully. The Jiji says that whereas the stethoscope does not furnish indications to a depth greater than 4 centimetres, the denon-kei shows the condition existing at a depth of 15 centimetres, and that it would be particularly efficacious in detecting the first symptoms of any lung trouble. It would be a remarkable coincidence if, while Dr. Ishigami was announcing the discovery of a serum to cure tuberculosis, Dr. Sakamoto was able to announce the construction of an instrument for diagnosing the earliest symptoms of that terrible disease, so widely fatal in Japan. The Asahi claims that the discovery of the denon-kei deserves to rank with that of the microscope and the X-rays.

KOREA.

Prince Wi Hwa has arrived in Seoul. His Imperial Highness was met at the station by Marquis Ito, in whose carriage he drove to the Palace and was received by the Emperor. Subsequently he again accompanied the Marquis to the house of Mr. Shimizu, of the First National Bank, where his temporary residence seems to have been fixed. Crowds of people are said to have called to offer their congratulations, and on that evening a reception was given in honour of the Prince's return. This incident is entirely owing to Marquis Ito's intervention and it is to be presumed that Prince Wi Hwa will prove a coöperator in the Japanese statesman's programme of reform. Perhaps it may be well to add that Wi Hwa is not the heir to the Throne: he is not the Prince Imperial.

The return of Prince Wi Hwa is reported to have produced a commotion in official circles in Seoul, where the appearance of every new figure on the stage is habitually regarded as the prelude of a renewed struggle for political power. The expectation is, however, that this anxiety will be allayed.

There are conflicting accounts about the recently projected railways from Seoul to Gensan and from Pyongyang to Gensan. Some accounts say that the idea of building these lines has been abandoned for the present, since the cost would be very heavy—some 30 millions of yen each—and the need for the lines is not pressing. Others allege that only the Pyongyang-Gensan line has been given up and that the Seoul-Gensan line will be shortly commenced. So far as Pyongyang and Gensan are concerned there is collateral evidence that the project has been at any rate deferred, for an allotment of six hundred thousand yen is to be made out of the recent loan of five millions on account of road construction between the two places—a distance of 150 miles.

It is stated that a number of competent school teachers—primary schools and middle schools—are to be engaged from Japan for service in Korea. One of the prominent features of Marquis Ito's plan is the improvement and extension of educational facilities.

There is to be a semi-official journal in Seoul, published in the Korean and Japanese languages under the auspices of the Residency General. A certain Mr. Ito is referred to as editor. This is a very necessary step. The Koreans, or at least such of them as read journals, have their ears daily assailed by the utterance of one of the most blindly prejudiced newspapers that ever went to press. The Seoul daily journal, which is printed in English and Korean, has gone on from bad to worse and is now quite laughable in its incompetence to imagine anything respectable about Japanese doings and Japanese motives in the peninsula. In the worst days of Yokohama journals we never had anything more blindly hostile than this passionate little sheet, and when that is said a great deal is said. It is wise therefore that the Koreans should have an opportunity of seeing the other side of the question.

In connexion with the increase of police organization in Korea, it is stated that 92 inspectors and chief constables are to be engaged at once in Japan. Under them will be placed a force of 1,039 Koreans. The training of them has commenced and will be finished by the end of June. There are to be 26 principal stations and 122 minor ones throughout the empire, and the cost of establishing them will be 272,000 yen, which will be taken from the money lent by Japan. It is an important feature of Marquis Ito's plan to establish in every part of the empire thoroughly trustworthy police tribunals to which the people will feel safe in carrying all their complaints and in looking for protection for life and property.

The telegraph states that the Korean Household has been advised and persuaded to assume a direct title to all the gold deposits in Pyongan-do and Hamgyong-do. These provinces are believed to be very rich in the precious metal and numerous applications have been received from foreigners and Koreans who seek mining permits. But the Household Department has engaged a Japanese expert, Mr. Mikami Tomotaka, to survey the two provinces, and he is said to have engaged 41 others of his nationals—mining engineers and workers—who have left Moji in a special steamer with apparatus purchased at a cost of 180,000 yen.

DEATH OF VISCOUNT NAGAOKA.

We regret to announce the death of Viscount Nagaoka, which took place on the 8th instant at 1.25 p.m. He was taken ill on the 6th of March and though the most expert medical aid was summoned his case proved hopeless. The obsequies will take place at the Awoyama Cemetery on the 18th, at about 9.30 a.m. The deceased—who was in his 64th year—was the fifth son of Prince Hosokawa, formerly feudal chief of Kumamoto. He distinguished himself at the time of the Restoration as a partizan of the Imperial cause and subsequently showed himself an ardent advocate of the introduction of foreign civilization. He spent some time in England where he qualified as a barrister of the Middle Temple. Afterwards he was appointed Minister to Holland. In 1884 he received the rank of Baron, and in 1901 that of Viscount. During his latter years he held the post of Vice President of the To-a Dibnu-kai, and devoted much attention to promoting intercourse between China and Japan. He was a Peer of the Musk Chamber and a member of the Upper House.

ARRIVAL OF BARON BAKMATEFF.

We heartily welcome the arrival of a Russian Minister once more in Tokyo, and trust that his coming may mark the opening of a new era of friendship between Russia and Japan. Up to the outbreak of war in 1904 the relations between the two Empires were invariably promoted in the most amicable manner by the Legation at Tora-no-Mon, and it only remains for Baron Bakmateff to revert to the kindly traditions established by his genial predecessors. There is no lack of willingness on Japan's side to restore the old bonds of amity.

We may mention here that it is not understood to be Russia's intention to disassociate herself from the other great Powers in converting the Tokyo legations into embassies, but she will allow a little time to elapse before taking the step. That is only natural after all.

GERMANY AND ALGERIAS.

The Jiji Shimpō's remarks upon the Alegerias conference seem to analyse the situation correctly. Germany did not from the first entertain any idea of greatly disturbing the status quo in Morocco, still less of supplanting or conspicuously diminishing French influence there. Her sole object was to enter a practical protest against being herself treated as a rank outsider; a Power having no claim to be consulted in the settlement of Morocco's international affairs. It may be confidently taken for granted that she never contemplated war or had the slightest disposition to provoke an appeal to arms. Hence it must be frankly admitted that, so far from suffering diplomatic discomfiture, she has gained her object. She has peacefully established her right to a voice in Morocco's fate and she has successfully asserted the principle she championed, the principle of the open door. It is true that very much larger intentions were attributed to her. But by whom? By telegraph agents and newspaper paragraphists. There were all the elements of a sensation ready to be worked up and the temptation was not resisted. The German Government, however, held on its path calmly and firmly, nor do we imagine that it is much chagrined at the sneers now thrown at it by the same news-mongers who had previously misinterpreted its mood so egregiously. The incident again illustrates the mischief of which the Fourth Estate is capable now-a-days. First, everything conceivable was done to set Germany, France and even England by the ears, and, secondly, that essay having failed, Germany is taunted for not having allowed herself to be baited.

THE CASUALTIES IN THE WAR.

The Nichi Nichi has a telegram from London giving the following figures of Russian losses during the war:—

Killed in battle.....	31,000
Wounded.....	115,000
Missing.....	37,500
Prisoners.....	53,900
Incapacitated for fighting.....	174,569

This table is not comprehensible. The Russians surely do not mean to pretend that their killed in battle totalled only 31,000. Such a figure would be obviously incredible, and would throw a new light on their uniform defeats. The world credits them with having fought most gallantly and defended themselves as stubbornly as the best Russian troops have ever done, yet we are now offered as the total of their killed in battle a figure little more than one half of the corresponding losses on the Japanese side. Moreover the last figure on the list is the most puzzling of all. One would expect it to be the total of the preceding figures, but that total is 238,200, and further, news agents do not telegraph totals when they give details. We are to suppose then that the aggregate Russian casualties were 412,769, and that under the heading "wounded" the framers of the table did not include persons incapacitated, a curious way of counting. The Invalid has been publishing figures relating to the Russian losses, and its latest total was 181,000 missing.

It will of course be observed that the above table does not include those that died of sickness or were invalided, and the telegraphist notes that it does not include naval casualties or losses sustained by the troops guarding the railways.

Inspector-General of Hospitals, Lt.-General Koike, speaking at a meeting of the Medical Societies on the 7th instant, gave the total number of patients—sick and wounded—treated by the Japanese medical staff as 632,690. The details of this aggregate are:—

Wounded and sick in the field (Manchuria and Korea).....	457,035
Taken sick in Japan.....	97,850
Sick or wounded Prisoners (Russian).....	77,805
Total.....	632,690

The sick and wounded among the Russian prisoners must of course be deducted from the Japanese total, which thus becomes 554,885. It would also be right, if we were calculating the results of the war only, to deduct a large part of those who fell sick in Japan, but that would be a different calculation.

General Koike gives further details. Thus:—

Total wounded.....	220,812
Among whom 47,387 died and ...173,425 recovered.
Total Sick.....	236,223
Among whom 27,158 died and ...209,065 recovered.

These sick and wounded were under the direct care of 10,175 doctors and nurses, namely 4,517 belonging to the Army Department, 5,470 belonging to the Red Cross Hospital, and 188 assistant doctors.

He also mentions that the medical necessities filled 3,200,000 parcels and that they cost 7,100,000 yen.

With these figures and the records of the Shokonsha ceremonials we are in a position to calculate the exact number of Japanese who lost their lives during the war:—

Worshipped at the Shokonsha Shrine in May, 1906.
Naval officers and men.....	1,857
Army.....	28,999
To be worshipped at Sokonsha in May, 1906.
Naval.....	122
Army.....	29,626

Total killed in battle.....	60,624
Died of wounds and disease.....	73,545

Total who lost their lives.....	134,169

REMINISCENCES OF SIR THOMAS SUTHERLAND.

The P. & O. S. N. Company have just despatched on her maiden voyage to China the steamship Devanha, a sister ship of the Delhi, Delta and Dongola. Her gross registered tonnage is 8,100, indicated horse-power 8,500, length 470ft., breadth 56ft., depth 32ft., and she has accommodation for 163 first saloon passengers and 80 second saloon passengers. Speaking at a luncheon given on board the new ship just before she sailed Sir Thomas Sutherland first explained the meaning of her name and then indulged in some reminiscences of the "good old times." He said that Devanha was the ancient name given to the locality we now speak of as Aberdeen by the Roman centurions who arrived at that northern capital. "They found they had got far enough North, and they returned South. That is an example which has since been followed by a good many people of that neighbourhood. The Devanha is intended for the mail between Bombay and China. We can look back to the time when the mail service to China was not carried on by ships of 8,000 tons but ships of less than 800 tons, which was about the average size of the vessels engaged in the mail service towards China when I was a youngster. Looking back to that time one cannot help feeling some amount of envy regarding the rates of freight and rates of passage money which were paid in those days. The rates of freight from China on silk, for instance, amounted to £24 a ton. Opium was carried from India to China at about £18 a ton, and silver was carried at the low rate of 2½ per cent. between London and Hongkong. It is within my recollection that on one occasion I loaded a small vessel of 650 tons with a freight which earned the P. & O. Company £30,000. It is another reminiscence of the same period that I have known a P. & O. captain come and protest against his ship being chiefly loaded with silver freight. The passage money was on a par with the freight in those days. You could not be conveyed from London to Hongkong for less than £150, and, at the then rate of exchange, the passage money home was 600 taels, or £200 sterling. I am afraid we shall never see those days again. I hope that half a century hence the chairman of the P. & O. Company will be able to speak of a new Devanha which will be treble the size of the ship on board of which we are to-day. I recollect that at the time of which I have been speaking the mails were not so punctual in arriving at Hongkong as they are to-day. A delay of a day or two or three days was looked upon as a perfectly natural thing, and a delay of even a week sometimes happened. Now, however, all that is changed."

Old residents of Yokohama can tell of the time when they went very humbly and with bated breath into the presence of the autocrat of the local P. & O. office and thought it a great and especial favour if he condescended to find room for their freight. To echo Sir Thomas' words: "Now, however, all that is changed."

THE JAPANESE PRIZE COURTS.

The Japanese Prize Courts, lower and upper, which were opened at the outbreak of war with Russia, closed their doors on the 31st of March. In connexion with this the Jiji Shimpō notes that the number of ships seized by Japanese war-vessels and brought before these prize-courts was 64 in all. Of these the Saseho Court tried 39 cases and the Yokosuka Court 25. The results were:—

Ships ordered to be confiscated with their cargoes (11 had no cargoes).....	44
Ships ordered to be confiscated with a part of their cargo.....	5
Cargoes confiscated without the ships.....	3
Ships released with their cargoes.....	6
Ships released after the signing of the Peace Treaty.....	6

Thus, in sum, the vessels confiscated were 49 (representing between 120,000 and 130,000 tons) and the vessels released were 15, namely, 9 on their merits and 6 as an act of grace after the signing of the Portsmouth Convention. Forty-six cases were appealed to the High Prize Court. This must be called a very satisfactory record as demonstrating that the action of the Japanese war-ships toward neutral vessels was distinctly correct. The same can scarcely be said of the Russian Navy. The cases of the Calchas, the Malacca, the Knight Commander and so forth present themselves at once to memory and recall the fact that Russia was in constant trouble with neutral States in these matters.

It is noteworthy that during the China-Japan war the Japanese Navy captured only one neutral State's ship—a German vessel—and that she was released.

The American ship Agenor was sold by public auction this morning by Jno. W. Hall and realized the sum of yen 14,500.

A CURIOUS EXPLANATION.

The Hochi Shimbun is engaged publishing paragraphs which have for purpose to prove that the Germans are at the root of all the boycotting of American goods in China and collaterally of the anti-foreign movement. The Tokyo journal does not adduce any tangible proof of this strange assertion. It merely appeals to its readers' credence in a story which many will be disposed to believe merely because of Germany's unpopularity in the East. A rider to the tale is that these same Germans, having inspired the Chinese with the idea of importing the Irish device of the boycott, went on to spread rumours of Japanese implication, thus clearing their own shoulders and transferring to the Japanese the reproach of having incited the whole movement. The Hochi alleges that the whole affair has "petered out"; that the boycott is dead; that the flame of anti-foreign resentment has paled and that no one believes in Japanese complicity. This is precisely one of those stories that will leave a long and perhaps an indelible trail. There is the fact that the Germans are now America's keenest competitors in the trade of China, and there is also the fact that the Chinese themselves would not have been likely to conceive the boycott programme, though concerning the latter point we must always remember that during the days of the factory at Canton, the Chinese learned thoroughly the device of combining against foreigners and even of refusing to deal with them. On the other hand, how is it to be proved that some German merchants, more shrewd than scrupulous, did not inspire the notion of a boycott, and did not endeavour to fix the responsibility on the Japanese? If the Hochi has any evidence stronger than mere hearsay it should advance it, and if not it is bound to openly refer the whole story to its true basis, unsupported rumour.

MR. KONO HIRONAKA.

The eleventh sitting of the Tokyo Local Court in the case of Mr. Kono Hironaka and his companions came to a conclusion on the 11th instant and the Court will deliver judgment on the 21st instant. No less than 54 barristers appeared for the defence, so the marvel is not that eleven sittings were required but that they sufficed. The principal barrister for the defence, Mr. Kikuchi Takeo, President of the Barristers' Association, spoke in conclusion a few words expressing satisfaction that the trial had been brought to an end so expeditiously and complimenting the barristers on their successful avoidance of duplicated arguments and on their general conduct of the case. Subsequently the accused were invited to speak on their own account, when Mr. Kono Hironaka rose, and after thanking the Judges for their manner of conducting the case, said that he had intended to make some remarks on the political aspect of the case, but as the Katsura Cabinet was no longer in office, he saw no reason to detain the Court. Professor Sakurai Kumataro, however, another of the accused, delivered an impassioned harangue, attacking the Public Procurator, the Judges and the witnesses for the Crown. He declared that the Procurator and the Judges were under the control of the Administration, and that the so-called majesty of the law did not exist; affirmed that the witnesses for the prosecution had evinced no regard for truth or frankness, and he ridiculed the Public Procurator for a weak expression of regret that men of such distinction as the accused should be arraigned on the evidence of persons of comparatively no standing. In conclusion he declared that in thus speaking he did not ask for acquittal but only that justice should be done and the independence of the Judiciary vindicated in a matter which had become public property at home and abroad. The Judges cautioned Professor Sakurai to be more circumspect but he paid no attention.

THE SILK CONDITIONING BILL.

The following letter was sent by Foreign Raw and Waste Silk Merchants of New York under date of March 9th through Mr. Eki Hioki, Chargé d'Affaires in Washington and is now circulated by the Association of Foreign Raw and Waste Silk Merchants of Yokohama:—

The undersigned firms being importers of and dealers in Raw Silk, and representing probably ninety five per cent. of all the direct dealings in Raw Silk between Japan and the United States of America, and practically all of whom are members of the Silk Association of America, do hereby respectfully request the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce of the Empire of Japan, to withdraw and annul the bill now before the Japan Diet to the effect that Raw Silk before exportation, be examined, inspected and packed under official supervision by the Yokohama Raw Silk Conditioning Works.

These innovations would, in the opinion of the undersigned, be an absolute interference with individual freedom of trading, and such governmental check on the liberty of the merchant would practically amount to a serious restraint of trade.

Whilst it is the opinion of the undersigned that this bill is the outgrowth of a desire on the part of the Japanese Government to comply with what they must naturally have understood to be the wishes of the Silk Trade of America, they would most respectfully represent that although officially the said Silk Association of America did express itself in favour of such a compulsory conditioning and packing under supervision of all silks sold for export in Japan, there was and is, nevertheless, a very important section of this same Silk Association of America that is and has always been unalterably opposed to the circular issued recommending such innovations.

This section, although certainly in the minority, is nevertheless a most important one inasmuch as it includes, not only the Japanese silk firms established in America, but also practically all the firms trading direct in raw silk between Japan and the United States.

One most significant fact, moreover, is that although the Silk Association of America, supported as it is by a majority composed of its silk consuming members, has officially expressed a desire for innovations that would practically compel the silk buyer in Japan to submit his every action to official supervision and decision without appeal; the American consumer himself would not seem to be disposed in his turn to accept the official decisions thus arrived at in Japan as final.

Nor could the illogical and one-sided nature of a compact that would result from such conditions have been carefully considered and weighed by them.

The undersigned, furthermore, do not think that the actual consumers of silk in America, who constitute a large majority of the Silk Association are really aware of the extent to which the admirably conducted Silk Conditioning Works of Yokohama are already used there by common consent of both buyers and sellers; nor do they believe that American consumers are cognizant of the excellent, and on the whole, very fair rules and regulations that already prevail in Japan and are universally accepted and practiced by the silk trade there, for the protection of all concerned.

Were the silk manufacturers of the United States as fully informed on all these points as are all the silk merchants that deal direct with Japan, it is the firm conviction of the undersigned that the great majority would express themselves fully satisfied with the rules that are already in vogue there for the protection of buyers, and they would concede the impracticability and uselessness of the innovations suggested.

In conclusion, the undersigned are strongly of opinion that the laws and regulations proposed in the bill would, if passed, not only prove entirely useless and impracticable, but they are furthermore convinced that the check on the liberty of trading which they would bring about, would hamper and prove very injurious to the silk business of Japan, thereby also indirectly benefiting that of China and Italy, as well as that of France and other countries where no such restraint upon trade is imposed.

MR. &amp; MRS. SCHIFF.

The Bank of Japan entertained Mr. and Mrs. Schiff at the Korakuen on the 7th instant. According to accounts in the Japanese papers the affair was very brilliant. About 500 persons sat down to dinner at 5 o'clock after a delightful afternoon spent in the Park.

Count Okuma entertained Mr. and Mrs. Schiff at luncheon on the 9th instant. In proposing Mr. Schiff's health Count Okuma spoke in strong terms of the assistance rendered by the American capitalist in connexion with the Japanese loan in America. Mr. Schiff, in reply, alluded in warm terms to the splendid reception he had received in Japan, and while eulogizing the qualities of the Japanese nation, averred that the people could not have developed such qualities except under the leadership of men like Count Okuma. He totally disavowed his own title to the compliments paid him, and expressed the hope that Japan's future would be as free from errors as her past had been.

Mr. Jacob Schiff left Tokyo on April 11th for Nikko where he stays at the Kanaya Hotel. He will spend about a week there.

"CAST THY BURDEN UPON HIM."

Plunged in depths of misery,
Burdened with a load of sin,
Tearfully we plead with Thee:
Jesus, Man of Sympathy.

Asking pardon, craving grace,
Come we in these Lenten hours;
Turn to us Thy pitying face:
Jesus, Man of Sympathy.

Sad our stumbles on life's road,
Hope dies down, despair sets in,
Thou alone canst ease our load:
Jesus, Man of Sympathy.

Naught can gauge our bitter grief,
As we think of Calvary,
Where Thou died'st for our relief:
Jesus, Man of Sympathy.

Falt'ring, on our knees, we cry,
Unto One who went before,
Help us; in our misery:
Jesus, Man of Sympathy.

* * * * *
Grows the burden strangely light—
Thou dost heed our trembling prayer—
Glow the world with promise bright:
Jesus, Man of Sympathy.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Viscount and Viscountess Aoki left Tokyo by the 9 a.m. train on Friday morning. Great numbers of people assembled to see them off. At 10.30 a.m., Viscount and Viscountess Aoki left the English Hatoba and proceeded to the Empress of China. At the hatoba, officials of the Foreign Office, high officials of local government offices, a number of foreigners, including nearly all the heads of American firms in the city, and leading Japanese merchants were present to bid farewell.

It appears to be certain that a Russian revolutionary paper is to be published in Nagasaki. The name, so far as we can make out, will be Woria (Liberty) and the editor will be M. Lasselle (or Lascelles). He is at present in Europe but will soon come to Nagasaki, where his lieutenant, M. Wajeki (?) is now making preparations for the issue. A prospectus has been published. Translated into Japanese it appears in the columns of the Asahi Shimbun, but to re-translate it into English seems a superfluous task, for it is merely an expression of the sentiments that every Russian lover of liberty must feel. There has been some delay owing to non-arrival of machinery and type at Yokohama, but that is only a temporary obstacle. Japan is a strange place to choose for the publication of such a newspaper. Its circulation in the Far East cannot be large, unless some special arrangements exist for getting it into Vladivostok and thence despatching it through Manchuria. However, there is not, so far as we know, anything in the laws of this country to interfere with the venture.

It has been decided to hold an industrial exhibition in Tokyo next spring (1907) under the name of the Tokyo Kwangyo Hakurankai. The expense is estimated at 340,419 yen, of which total the leading business-men put up 104,000 yen, and the remainder will be obtained by a special increase of the land-rate, the business tax and the house tax. Doubtless manufactures from all parts of the empire will be admitted. This exhibition is not to be confounded with the domestic exhibitions which are supposed to be held once every four years, and of which the last was in Osaka in 1902. The next of this series should be in Tokyo during the current year, but as it had to be postponed on account of the war, the city appears disposed to console itself with a private display in the interval.

It is stated that Belgian, American and English capitalists have finally arranged for the construction at Tanoura near Moji of a big dock capable of accommodating twenty-thousand-ton steamers. Foreign enterprise is beginning to turn very earnestly in the direction of this country. There is the big factory for explosives at Hiratsuka, the glass factory, the sawn wood factory and now this great dock.

Admiral Sir Gerard Noel left Yokohama on April 5th by the Empress of China for America on his way home. Many Japanese and foreign officials and merchants were present at the English hatoba to wish him and Miss Noel bon voyage.

It will be remembered that in February last a telegram reached Tokyo to the effect that two Japanese had been seized in Australia, having in their possession maps of fortified places, which must have been fraudulently obtained. The report, sedulously circulated, created some commotion at the time, and was used by the Yellow Perilites to bolster their prediction that this Empire entertains designs against Australia. As might have been expected, the facts now ascertained show that the whole tale was a canard with just the proverbial feather of truth. On the 19th of November there left Sydney by the Australian Messrs. Kanematsu and Fusajiro, who have for years been conducting trade on a large scale between Kobe and Australia. The two men landed at Thursday Island, and finding it convenient for business reasons to remain there a few days, sent word that their baggage should be landed at the next port of call. This was done, and the customs officials, examining the baggage, found in it a map which some news-monger made the basis of the above report. There was a map, it is true, but it was merely a map of Sydney Harbour, which Mr. Kanematsu was carrying to Kobe for the information of the experts who are planning extensive improvements in Kobe harbour. These facts have been made known in Australia and have had a calming effect. How much quieter the world's nerves would be if the sensational paragraphist became an extinct monster!

Tokyo newspapers deny that the Japanese Government has received any official intimation either of the assembling of the second Hague Conference or of the protests which, according to Reuter and other sources of information, Russia is supposed to have notified her intention of submitting. The alleged date of the conference is the 10th of July, and it is plain that if no official announcement has yet reached Tokyo, that date must be greatly premature. There must be some grain of truth in the account of Russia's intentions, since it reached Tokyo from several different quarters, but in view of the Japanese Government's lack of intimation the story must be received with all reserve. It is certainly a reversal of all the natural order of events that Russia should be the Power to suggest convening a second meeting of the Peace Conference, and that she should have the assurance to raise questions as to the orthodox usages of warfare, nevertheless there is nothing like courage. We need not go so far as to follow one of the Tokyo journals which, commenting on this affair, compares Russia to the old-time burglar who, on the following morning, paid a visit of condolence to his victim. But we certainly do think that if the Hague Tribunal was to be again invited to sit, the summons might have come from somewhere else than St. Petersburg, and we also think that with Rojstvensky's doings on her record, Russia might wisely have refrained from challenging inquiry into the international usages of warfare.

There is talk of extensive reforms in the system of the Metropolitan Police. A movement for the abolition of this force as at present organized and its transfer to the municipality has long been in evidence, and was greatly accentuated by the riots of last September when the police incurred a heavy responsibility. Speaking from our own experience and observation we should say that this movement has always been in the main political. The police of Tokyo are an excellent body of men, assiduous, obliging and competent. Had the citizens' estimate alone been taken of them, they would have emerged with flying colours. But they certainly committed an error on the 5th of September, and followed it up by recourse to undue violence. We may take it for granted, too, that there is plenty of room for improvement. At any rate the Minister of State for Home Affairs is reported to have large reforms in contemplation, though details are wanting, with the exception of the fact that there is no intention of transferring the force to the Municipality. The Chuo Shimbun is conspicuously explicit on the subject, and naively observes that in weeding out the force, some of the tares will probably become available for the provinces and for Korea!

We observe that some of our contemporaries have described the new supplementary extradition treaty between America and Japan as a fait accompli and that they speak of it as an altogether novel instrument. The facts are that the treaty has still to be submitted to Congress, which means that it may not go into force until the close of this year, if at all, and that it is merely an extension and improvement of an extradition treaty concluded twenty years ago between Count Inouye and Mr. Hubbard. This latter document having been found quite inadequate to meet the needs of the rapidly increasing intercourse between the two countries, was supplemented by a convention between Baron Komura and Mr. Griscom, which document now waits to pass through the ordinary routine.

Governors of prefectures throughout the Empire will meet in conference at the Home Office during a week from April 25th. The Premier, and the Minister for Home Affairs will address them on administrative subjects and other Ministers of State will instruct them as to financial and other affairs.

There is to be a special issue of postage stamps and post-cards to commemorate the grand military festival on the 30th instant. So long as that strange race of beings called philatelists exists, the post-office is well advised in making money out of them.

Tokyo journals state that the Manshu S.S. Company has been successfully formed with a capital of 500,000 yen, and has obtained some of the permits necessary for the conduct of its business. Its programme is to place steamers on the Liao, the Yalu and the Sungari.

Since 1839 Oxford has won the University Boat Race on 34 occasions, and including the victory of this year Cambridge has scored 28 wins. The 1877 race was a dead heat.

Our readers are aware that a large further expenditure is needed on account of the Wakamatsu Seitetsu-jo (Iron Foundry). Already the enterprise has involved an outlay of over 20 million yen, and in the Continuing Expenditures of this year's Budget it stands for a sum of 1,251,642 yen, spread over a period of 5 years. This, however, is part of the outlay previously voted. There is another entirely new item in the Budget, namely, 1,781,213 yen, which stands as a single expenditure but is alleged to be only the first installment of a sum of ten millions. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun lends its editorial weight to this statement and describes at some length the steps that are to be taken for developing the Foundry. During the current fiscal year, we read, nothing will be done except to purchase land and to construct residences for officials. Next year, machinery will be ordered, and preparations made for erecting it, and in the third year everything will be completed that is essential to the work. Our contemporary mentions several parts of the structure in detail, but there does not seem to be any occasion for translating these particulars. The interesting fact is that the Foundry will be a most extensive institution, standing in the State's books for a sum of over 30 million yen.

The Kokumin comments on the remarkable exodus of Foreign Representatives that is about to occur. M. Harmand, Minister of France, leaves on the 21st instant; M. de Freitas, Representative of Portugal, leaves on the 14th; M. Pereira, Representative of Brazil, starts in a few days; Baron d'Anehan, Minister of Belgium, will soon depart on leave; the Representatives of Italy and Austria-Hungary are soon to quit Tokyo, and Sir Claude MacDonald will pay a visit to England in the autumn. On the other hand, the new Representatives of Germany and the United States may be expected soon, and the Russian Minister has just arrived. Our contemporary also notes that Mr. J. C. Hall, British Consul-General, is on the eve of setting out to take a well earned spell of rest. During his absence Mr. Hobart-Hampden will be in charge of the Consulate-General at Yokohama.

It is expected that there will be very keen competition for the 15 prize steamers which the Naval Department is offering for sale. At first the impression was that intending purchasers would combine to prevent appreciation of prices, but that forecast has not been fulfilled. Several foreign firms are said to be among the bidders, and in Japan the Tanko Tetsudo Kaisha, the Mitsui, the Nippon Shosen Kaisha and the Osaka Shosen Kaisha are all bidding against each other. The reason assigned for the action of the Tanko Tetsudo Kaisha is peculiar. It is stated that in view of the imminent purchase of the Company's lines by the state, the Directors apprehend a necessity for providing independent means of transport, and therefore they want steamers. But even when the railway passes into State possession, the necessity of transporting the coal to a port of shipment will remain as imperative as ever, and for that purpose the railway will have to be employed. It does not appear that the company will need any more steamers after the line has passed into official hands than it needs now. Probably the true explanation is that the Directors look for increased output.

The treasury of the Mikasa has been brought to the surface. It contained some 40,000 yen in gold and silver and about 3,000 yen in notes. The latter are of course destroyed.

The man who broke into the residence of Mr. Huntingdon Wilson last July has been apprehended. He turns out to be one Suzuki Yashiro. On the 5th instant he was sentenced to 6 months' major imprisonment, with police surveillance for the same time.

THE BOOKSHELF.

"The Kokka."

Nos. 189 and 190 of the Kokka are before us. They are attractive and instructive issues. The illustrations show beautiful examples of master-pieces by Kenzan, by Korin, by Kōetsu, by Kano Tannyu, by Kano Utanosuke, and others. The letter-press also is very interesting, especially the continuation of Mr. Hamada Kōsaku's essay about Græco-Indian influence upon the Far-Eastern Arts. This is a subject which has never been exhaustively treated. Indeed materials for exhaustive treatment are still wanting. But Mr. Hamada's work, so far as it has gone, is satisfactory, and it is to be hoped that he will carry his analysis much further, though we observe that he has not continued it in No. 190. The Kokka is well sustaining its reputation, and the public are quickly learning to look forward with interest and pleased expectation to each of its issues.
